The State of U.P.

Cr. A. No. 108 of 1969.

Penal Code (XLV of 1860), section 302—Punishment for murder—Award of lesser sentence—Discretion of Court.

Both the sentences of death and imprisonment for life for the offence of murder are legal and the Courts have a fair discretion in the matter, in the light of the circumstances existing in each case.

The previous history of the accused in the present case, which shows a certain amount of lack of control and a sense of grievance together with certain abnormalities of mind, make it clear that it was an act of a person who was easily excited and therefore likely to be moved by irresistible impulses. Considering also his age, (22 years and 9 months), although his act was probably pre-planned in the sense that he had a knife with him, it was an act of person who suddenly lost control. Although under our present law the plea of irresistible impulse is not yet accepted as a defence to a charge of murder, it may be taken into account in assessing the true punishment to be given in a given case. Therefore, although the Supreme Court would be very unwilling to interfere in matters of sentence, on the facts of the present case the ends of justice would be amply served by reducing the sentence of death to one of imprisonment for life.

C.A. Nos. 564-571 of 1968.

Tax recovery—Limitation—Agreement between Income-tax Department and assessee—Tax to be paid in instalments and on failure to pay any of the instalments whole amount to be paid forthwith—Failure to pay first instalment—Proceedings for recovery commenced after the expiration of one year from the last day of the financial year in which the demand was made—Whether barred by limitation.

Indian Income-tax Act 1922 (Central Act XI of 1922), section 46 (1), (7) proviso, (iv).

Under an agreement entered into between the assessee and the Income-tax Department the total tax liability of the parties was calculated and each party became jointly and severally liable for the whole amount. The instalments were fixed to be payable on 31st March, every year, commencing from 31st March, 1953, and ending with 31st March, 1957, and on the breach of a single instalment the whole of the amount became exigible. On 22nd September, 1952, notices of demand were sent to the assessee for the payment of the first instalment which fell due on 31st March, 1953. The assessee failed to pay the first instalment on and 14th March, 1956, certificates under section 46 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, were issued for the recovery of the amount. The assessee filed writ petitions in the High Court to quash the recovery proceedings on the ground that the proceedings were barred by limitation because the proceedings should have been commenced within the end of the financial year commencing from 31st March, 1953. The High Court held that the proceedings were not barred by limitation. On appeal to Supreme Court, Held, (by majority) (Hegde, J., dissenting)—The recovery proceedings were not barred by limitation.

S—N R C

Clause (iv) of the proviso to sub-section (7) of section 46 does not mention about the exigibility of the whole amount or exigibility of any particular instalment. It only says that if instalments are granted, the time of one year ending with the end of the financial year is to be calculated from the date on which the last instalment is payable.

Held on facts, the scheme of the instalments took the matter out of the main part of sub-section (7) and brought it within the proviso to clause (iv). Under the assessment order a notice of demand was sent to pay the money of the first instalment of Rs. 9,50,000 by 31st March, 1953. On breach of it, the whole amount was said to be exigible and the demand in respect of that was also made. The appellants, therefore, became defaulters on the failure to pay the first instalment. Whenever instalments are granted, the period of limitation counts from the last instalment and here it would be one year from 31st March, 1957. The certificate was issued on 14th March, 1956, and, therefore, it was well within the period of limitation.

District Collector v.

M/s. Ibrahim & Co.

C.A. Nos. 1285-1309 of 1966.

Constitution of India (1950), Articles 14, 19, 352, 358, 359 and 301 to 305—Proclamation of emergency under Article 352—Effect—Executive action of Government, if and when protected by Article 358 or 359—Freedom of trade guaranteed by Article 301—Cannot be taken away by an executive fiat.

On 30th December, 1964 the State of Andhra Pradesh ordered that the sugar quota allocated to the twin cities of Hyderabad and Secunderabad be given in its entirety to a co-operative society at Hyderabad. On that account the respondents, who held licences under the Andhra Pradesh Sugar Dealers Licensing Order, 1963, for distribution of sugar and who were also recognised dealers under the Sugar Control Order, 1963, were prevented from carrying on their business. When this order was made the proclamation of emergency declared by the President under Article 352 of the Constitution of India on 26th October, 1962, was in force. On the question of validity of the order :

Held, the order was invalid and had been rightly struck down by the High Court as "null, void and ultra vires."

No doubt on the issue of the proclamation of emergency under Article 352, the State is, for the duration of the emergency, competent to enact legislation, notwithstanding that it impairs the freedoms guaranteed by Article 19 of the Constitution. The State is also competent to take executive action which the State would, but for the provisions contained in Article 19, be competent to take. But the executive order immune from attack is only that order which the State was competent, but for the provisions contained in Article 19, to make. Executive action of the State which is otherwise invalid is not immune from attack merely because a proclamation of emergency is in operation when it is taken. Since the impugned order was plainly contrary to the statutory provisions contained in the Andhra Pradesh Sugar Dealers Licensing Order, 1963 and the Sugar Control Order, it was not protected under Article 358 of the Constitution.

Nor had it the protection under Article 359. Only if the impugned order was shown to be made under the authority reserved by the Defence of India Ordinance or rules made thereunder, the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain a petition for impairment of the guarantee under Article 14 may be excluded. But the impugned action was not shown to be taken under the Defence of India Ordinance or under the rules or order made thereunder.

Again under Article 301 the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse throughout the territory of India is declared free, subject to restrictions contained in Articles 303 to 305. By Article 304 even by Legislature, restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse with or within the State may only be imposed, if such restrictions are reasonable and are required in the public interest and the Bill or amendment is introduced or moved in the Legislature of a State with the previous sanction of the President. Obviously the guarantee under Article 501 cannot be taken away by executive action.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 166 (3)—Madras Government Business Rules, Rule 23 (A)—Validity—If ultra vires the powers under Article 166 (3).

Rule 23 (A) of the Madras Government Business Rules, which provides that the powers and functions which the State Transport undertaking may exercise under section 68-C of the Motor Vehicles Act shall be exercised and discharged on behalf of the State Government by the Secretary to the Government of Madras in the Industries, Labour and Housing department, is valid and is not ultra vires the powers under Article 166 (3) of the Constitution of India.

The Constitution has authorised the Governor under Article 166 (3) to make rules for the more convenient transaction of business of the Government of the State and for the allocation amongst its Ministers, the business of the Government. The Governor can not only allocate the various subjects amongst the Ministers but may go further and designate a particular official to discharge any particular function, on the advice of the Council of Ministers. In the very nature of things, neither the Council of Ministers nor an individual Minister can attend to the numerous matters that come up before the Government. These matters have to be attended to and decisions taken by various officials at various levels. When those officials discharge the functions allotted to them, they are doing so as limbs of the Government and not as persons to whom the power of the Government had been delegated.

It cannot therefore be contended that by making rule 23 (A) the power under section 68-C of the Motor Vehicles Act conferred by Parliament to the State Government has been delegated to somebody else.

Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), sections 410, 418 and 421—Appeal under section 410—Summary dismissal by the High Court by the word “rejected”—Propriety.

Though on appeal under section 410, Criminal Procedure Code, by a person convicted at a trial held by a Sessions Judge or an Additional Sessions Judge the appellant is entitled under section 418 of the Code to challenge the conclusions both on facts and of law and to ask for a reappraisal of the evidence, the appellate Court has nevertheless full power under section 421 of the Code to dismiss the appeal in limine even without searching for the records, if on perusal of the impugned order and the petition of appeal it is satisfied with the correctness of the order appealed against. This power has to be exercised after perusing the petition of appeal and the copy of the order appealed against and after affording to the appellant or his pleader a reasonable opportunity of being heard in support of the appeal. The summary decision is accordingly a judicial decision which vitally affects the convicted appellant and in a fit case it is also open to challenge on appeal in the Supreme Court. An order summarily dismissing an appeal by the word “rejected”, as in the present case, though not violative of any statutory provision removes nearly every opportunity for detection of errors in the order. Such an order does not speak and is inscrutable giving no indication of the reasoning underlying it. It may at times embarrass the Supreme Court when the order appealed against prima facie gives rise to arguable points. When, therefore, an appeal in the High Court raises a serious and substantial point which is prima facie arguable it is improper for that Court to dismiss it summarily without giving some indication of its view on the points raised. The interest of justice and fairplay require the High Court in such a case to give an indication of its views so that the Supreme Court in the event of an appeal from that order being presented, has the benefit of the High Court’s opinion on those points.

Held on facts. that the order of dismissal in limine of the appeal of the appellants by the High Court was insupportable.

C.A. No. 1701 of 1968.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), section 123 (4)—When attracted.

In an election it is always open to a candidate to show that his rival candidate is lacking in knowledge in education and is not capable of managing the affairs properly in any public body. A slight exaggeration is quite natural on occasions when canvassing is going on for an election.

Where statements of facts are given and only inferences are drawn the words used at the time of putting down the inferences have to be held to be expressions of opinion and not statements of fact.

It is quite clear that the words Deshdrohita and Vishwasghataкта, (Assamese words for revolt against country and treachery or breach of faith respectively). have been used only to bring into light the conduct of the respondent which was adverse to the policies of the Congress and against the interests of the country. Possibly, milder words could have been used to describe his conduct on these occasions, but even the use of strong words is not very unnatural at the time of election. The words used though harsh were not such as to lead the voters to think that the respondent had a low moral character. Care was taken to give the facts from which inferences were being drawn and the voters could well perceive for themselves whether the inference which was drawn and expressed in these strong terms was justified or not.

Further, a false statement of fact which deals with the political position or reputation or action of a candidate cannot be held to be a false statement as to the personal character of the respondent and cannot therefore constitute corrupt practice under section 143 (4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951.

Held on facts, that the High Court was not right in setting aside the election of the appellant on the ground that he was guilty of the corrupt practice under section 123 (4) of the Act.

It cannot be contended that goodwill may be taken into account only when there is a general dissolution of the firm and not when the representative of a partner claims his share in the firm, which by express stipulation is to continue notwithstanding the death of a partner. Sections 39, 42, 46 and 55 (1) of the Partnership Act do not support such a contention. These provisions deal with the concept and consequences of dissolution of the firm; they do not either abrogate the terms of the contract between the partners relating to the consequences to ensue in the event of the death of a partner when the firm is not to stand dissolved by such death, nor to the right which the partner has in the assets and property of the firm.

It cannot be argued that in interpreting a deed of partnership, the business whereof it is stipulated shall be continued by the surviving partners even after the death of a partner, the Court will not award to the legal representatives of the deceased partner a share in the goodwill in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary. The goodwill of a firm in that component of the total value of the undertaking which is attributable to the ability of the concern to earn profits over a course of years because of its reputation, location and other features and is an asset. In interpreting the deed of partnership, the Court will insist upon some indication that the right to a share in the assets is, by virtue of the agreement that the surviving partners are entitled to carry on the business on the death of the partner, to be extinguished. In the absence of a provision expressly made or clearly implied, the normal rule that the share of a partner in the assets devolves upon his legal representatives will apply to the goodwill as well as to the other assets.

An agreement between the partners that the name, the place of business and the reputation of the firm are to be utilised by the surviving partners will not necessarily warrant an inference that it was intended that the heirs of the deceased partner will not be entitled to a share in the goodwill.

Joint Commercial Tax Officer v.
Young Men's Indian Association.
C.A. Nos. 1724-1727 of 1967.

Madras General Sales Tax Act (I of 1959), section 2 (g) and (n) —Members club preparing and supplying food, snacks, beverages, etc., to its members— If liable to pay sales tax.

By Majority : The essential question, in the present case, is whether the supply of the various preparations by each club (viz., the Metropolitan Club, Madras, the Young Men's Indian Association, Madras and the Lawley Institute, Ootacamund), to its members involved a transaction of sale. The State Legislature being competent to legislate only under Entry 54, List II of the 7th Schedule to the Constitution the expression "sale of goods" bears the same meaning which it has in the Sale of Goods Act, 1930. Thus in spite of the definition contained in section 2 (n) read with Explanation I of the Madras General Sales Tax Act, 1959, if there is no transfer of property from one to another there is no sale which would be exigible to tax. If the club even though a distinct legal entity is only acting as an agent for its members in the matter of supply of various preparations to them no sale would be involved as the element of transfer would be completely absent.

The final conclusion of the High Court in the judgment under appeal was that the case of each club was analogous to that of an agent or mandatory investing his own money for preparing things for consumption of the principal and later recouping himself for the expenses incurred. Thus, as no transaction of sale was involved there could be no levy of tax under the provisions of the Act on the supply of refreshments and preparation by each one the clubs in the present case to its members.

Case-law discussed.

Per Shah, J., (in a separate but concurring opinion) : Whether refreshments beverages and other articles supplied by a Members' club for consideration to its members are in law sold depends upon the circumstances in which the transaction takes place. In each case the liability to tax of the transaction will depend upon its strictly legal form. If an incorporated members' club supplies its property to its members at a fixed tariff, the transaction would readily be deemed to be one for sale, even if the transaction is on a non-profit basis ; such a transaction would be liable to sales tax. Where, however, the club is merely acting on behalf of the members to make available to them refreshments, beverages and other articles, the transaction will not be regarded as a sale, for the club is the agency through which the members have arranged that the refreshments, etc., should be made available. The test in each case is whether the club transfers property belonging to it for a price or the club acts as an agent for making available property belonging to its members.

(His Lordship however disagreed with the majority on the question of the appropriateness of applying the analogy of the cases decided under the Licensing Act in the United Kingdom concerning the supply by clubs of alcoholic drinks to their members, to a taxing statute.)

Pepsu Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (XIII of 1955), as amended by Pepsu Act (XV of 1956), sections 32-B and 22—Scope—Act if hit by Article 14 of the Constitution.

Section 32-B applies only to a landowner owning or holding land under his personal cultivation which in the aggregate exceeds the permissible limit and the contention that the words "under the personal cultivation" in the section applies only to a tenant and not to a landowner is untenable. Although this interpretation leads to some hardship on some person this is the correct meaning and accordingly the appellant cannot take advantage of section 32-B and the subsequent provisions in Chapter IV-A. If chapter IV-A is out of the way then it is difficult to hold that section 22 does not apply, on the facts of this case. Section 22 clearly enables the respondents to put in applications to acquire proprietary rights as it was not contested that they were tenants within the definition of the word in section 20.

The point that Pepsu Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1955, is hit by Article 14 of the Constitution of India is not open for any further discussion because the Supreme Court has held that this Act is protected by Article 31-A of the Constitution and cannot be challenged on the ground that it violates Article 14. Madras Cultivating Tenants' Protection Act (XXV of 1955), sections 3 (2) (d) and 6-A—Provisions of section 6-A, when attracted—Effect of tenant denying title of landlord.

The clear import of section 6-A is that in any suit before any civil Court for possession, if the defendant proves not only that he is a cultivating tenant but also that he is entitled to the benefits of the Act the civil Court is bound to transfer it to the Revenue Divisional Officer and cannot proceed to try and dispose of it itself. In the present case it has been found by the High Court as also by the trial Court that the appellants had wilfully denied the title of the respondent who is the landlord. They thus became disentitled to the benefits of the Act. Consequently the civil Court had jurisdiction to proceed with the trial and there was no question of its transferring the suit to the Revenue Divisional Officer. There has been a consistent course of decisions of the Madras High Court that in order to attract the applicability of section 6-A both the conditions must co-exist, namely, the defendant must be a cultivating tenant within the meaning of the Act and he should be entitled to the benefits of the Act. If both these conditions are not satisfied no question of any transfer under section 6-A will arise. The civil Court may have to determine, for the purpose of coming to the conclusion whether a suit has to be transferred under section 6-A, certain questions which are within the jurisdiction of the Revenue Court under the Act. But that cannot affect the interpretation of the words "cultivating tenant entitled to the benefits of the Act."

Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), sections 156, 169 and 190 (1) (c)—Police submitting final report after investigation that there is no case—Magistrate if can call upon police to submit a charge-sheet.

It has been emphasised in several decisions that it is of the utmost importance that the judiciary should not interfere with the police in matters which are within their province and into which the law imposes on them the duty of enquiry.

The provisions of the Cr. P. Code do not empower the magistrate to ask the police to submit a charge-sheet. If, however, the magistrate is of opinion that the report submitted by the police requires further investigation the magistrate may order investigation under section 156 (3) of the Code. Directing a further investigation is entirely different from asking the police to submit a charge-sheet. Further more, section 190 (1) (c) of the Code empowers the magistrate to take cognizance of an offence notwithstanding a contrary opinion of the police.

Thus, a magistrate cannot call upon the police to submit a charge-sheet when they have sent a report, that there is no case for sending up the accused for trial.

(Divergent views expressed by various High Courts referred to. Decisions of Calcutta and Madras High Courts approved and those of Bombay and Patna High Courts overruled.)

V.K.

Appeal allowed.

It will be convenient to deal with the points 2 and 3 mentioned above together. It is true, as urged by the learned Counsel for the petitioner, that this Court has consistently held that the grounds must have relevance to the maintenance of public order, and that they should not relate merely to the maintenance of order. It is true, as laid down by this Court, that the contravention of any law always affects order but before it can be said to affect public order it must affect the community or the public at large. As Ramaswami, J., put it in *Pushkar Mukherjee and others v. The State of West Bengal*¹ "in this connection we must draw a line of demarcation between serious and aggravated forms of disorder which directly affect the community or injure the public interest and the relatively minor breaches of peace of a purely local significance which primarily injure specific individuals and only in a secondary sense public interest."

The question which arises is this, do the grounds reproduced above relate merely to maintenance of order or do they relate to the maintenance of public order? It will be noticed that the detenu in each of these cases acted along with associates who were armed with lathis, iron rods, acid bulbs, etc. It is clearly said in ground No. 1 that he committed a riot and indiscriminately used acid bulbs, iron rods, lathis, etc., endangering human lives. This ground cannot be said to have reference merely to maintenance of order because it affects the locality and everybody who lives in the locality. Similarly, in the second ground, he along with his associates prevented the police constables from discharging their lawful duties and thus affected everybody living in the locality.

In ground No. 3, again the whole locality was in danger as the detenu and his associates were armed with deadly weapons and these were in fact used indiscriminately endangering human lives in the locality. The object of the detenu seems to have been to terrorise the locality and bring the whole machinery of law and order to a halt. We are unable to say that the Commissioner of Police could not in view of these grounds come to the conclusion that the detenu was likely to act in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of public order in the future and it was necessary to prevent him from doing so. The fact that public order is affected by an act which was also an offence under the Indian Penal Code, seems to us to be irrelevant.

In the result the petition fails and is dismissed.

Working Journalists (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, (XLV of 1955), sections 2, 5 (1) (d) and 17—Scope—"Newspaper employee" and "Working Journalist", definitions of (to be subject to a context to the contrary)—Respondent (an ex-employee), if entitled to maintain his application for gratuity.

Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), section 115—Scope—Estoppel—Rule of evidence only, not of substantive right—Ingredients—Burden of proof—Representation to be clear and unambiguous and not indefinite.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), section 2 (rr) (i)—'Wages', meaning of—Monetary value of the free telephone and newspapers and also the car allowance, if could be included as part of wages.

The definition section 2 of the Working Journalists (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1955 commences with the words "In this Act unless the context otherwise requires" and provides that the definitions of the various expressions will be those that are given there. Similar qualifying expressions are also to be found in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes settlement Act, 1947 and certain other statutes dealing with industrial questions. It is, therefore, clear that the definitions of "a news-paper employee" and "a working journalist" have to be construed in the light of and subject to the context requiring otherwise. Section 5 of the Act, which confers the right to gratuity, itself contemplates in clause (d) of sub-section 1 a case of payment of gratuity to the nominee or the family of a working journalist who dies while he is in the service of a newspaper establishment. Section 17(1) provides that where any amount is due under the Act to a newspaper employee from an employer, such an employee himself or a person authorised by him or, in case of his death, any member of his family can apply to the State Government or other specified authority for the recovery thereof. Similar provisions are also to be found in section 33-C (1) of the Industrial Disputes Act. Claims under that section include those for compensation in cases of retrenchment, transfer of an undertaking and closure under Chapter V-A of that Act, all of which would necessarily be claims arising after termination of service and the claimant would obviously be one in all those cases who would not be presently employed in the establishment of the employer against whom such claims are made. Likewise, the claim for gratuity under section 17 read with section 5 of the Act would itself be one which accrues after the termination of employment. These provisions, therefore, clearly indicate that it is not only a newspaper employee presently employed in particular newspaper establishment who can maintain an application for gratuity. The scheme of all these Acts dealing with industrial questions is to permit an ex-employee to avail of the benefits of their provisions, the only requirement being that the claim in dispute must be one which has arisen or accrued whilst the claimant was in the employment of the person against whom it is made. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the definitions of a newspaper employee" and "working journalist" being subject to a context to the contrary, the benefit of sections 5 and 17 is available to an ex-employee though he has ceased to be in the employment of that particular newspaper establishment at the time of his application for gratuity.

Having signed the receipt in full settlement of all his claims and having thereby induced the company to accept his resignation without insisting on a full month's notice, was he estopped from making claims in respect of his leave for one month, the car allowance and the free telephone and newspapers and for including them as part of his wages for calculating gratuity? Assuming that the rule of estoppel, as incorporated in section 115 of the Evidence Act, were to apply, the foundation of that rule is that it is inequitable and unjust to a person, that if another person by a representation induces him to act as he would not have otherwise acted, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny the effect of his former statement to the loss and injury of the person who has acted on it. The burden of proving the ingredients of section 115 of the Evidence Act lies on the party claiming estoppel. The representation which is the basis for the rule must be clear and unambiguous and not indefinite, upon which the party relying on it is said to have, in good faith and in belief of it, acted. The statement of account prepared at the time when the respondent gave the said receipt appears to indicate that the benefit of the free telephone and newspapers and the car allowance were not taken into account and gratuity due to the respondent was calculated on the amount of pay being comprised of basic wages and dearness allowance only. But the inference that the respondent had given up his aforesaid claims when he passed the said receipt appears to be rebutted by other facts. In these circumstances it becomes doubtful whether he could be said to have been estopped from making the said claims on the ground only of the said receipt, if that receipt was obtained, as alleged by him, under the stress of circumstances. In this connection the fact that he kept the said cheque uncashed is not totally without relevance. Under section 115 of the Evidence Act the representation which estops a person making it from acting contrary to it is one on the belief of which the other person acts in a manner he would not have done but for it and on believing it to be true. Such a conclusion is difficult in face of the uncontradicted statements in the letter Exhibit W/4 that the management would not give him the letter of acceptance of his resignation unless he signed the said receipt in full settlement of all his claims. The plea of estoppel made on behalf of the company, therefore, cannot be accepted.

So far as the car allowance is concerned, there was nothing to suggest that it was paid to reimburse him of the expenses of conveyance which he would have to incur for discharging his duties as the special correspondent, or that it was anything else than an allowance within the meaning of section 2 (rr) of Industrial Disputes Act. It would, therefore, fall under the inclusive part (i) of the definition. Likewise, the benefit of the telephone and newspapers was allowed to the respondent not merely for the use thereof in connection with his employment or duties connected with it. Both the car allowance and the benefit of the free telephone and newspapers appear to have been allowed to him to directly reduce the expenditure which would otherwise have gone into his family budget and were therefore items relevant in fixation of fair wages. That being the position, the two items could on the facts and circumstances of the present case be properly regarded as part of the respondent's wages and had to be taken into calculations of the gratuity payable to him.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Award dated the 28th February, 1966 of the Labour Court, Delhi in W. J. No. 2 of 1964.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Shelat, J.—This appeal, by Special Leave, is directed against the award of the Labour Court, Delhi in a reference made to it under section 17 (2) of the Working Journalists (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1955 (referred to hereinafter as the Act).

The relevant facts leading to the said reference may first be stated.

By its letter dated 16th January, 1953 the appellant-company appointed the respondent as a staff correspondent at Gauhati on a basic salary of Rs. 300 and dearness allowance at 40 per cent thereof in addition to a fixed conveyance allowance of Rs. 100 per month. Sometime thereafter the respondent was transferred to the company's branch office at Delhi where he worked as a special correspondent. By 1963 the remuneration payable to him came to Rs. 700 as basic pay, Rs. 497 as dearness allowance, Rs. 200 per month as car allowance in addition to a free telephone and free newspapers. On 8th October, 1963, while he was on leave, the respondent tendered his resignation. On 14th October, 1963 P. K. Roy, the company's General Manager, informed the respondent that his letter of 8th October, 1963 could not be considered as one of resignation as under the company's rules he would have first to report on duty and then to give a notice. On 21st October, 1963, however, the company accepted the resignation with effect from that date and thereupon the respondent joined the Indian Express on 23rd October, 1963. Meanwhile one V. G. Karnik on behalf of the company, informed the respondent by his letter dated 19th November 1963 that in the absence of a proper notice by him there could be no termination of employment and that "your reported acceptance of another employment in the circumstances is in contravention of the terms and conditions of service of this company." The respondent had, in the meantime, claimed compensation for leave due to him, to which claim the said letter of Karnik replied that the company's rules did not permit any such compensation where an employee had resigned. On 21st November, 1963 the respondent wrote to the said Roy (Ex. W/4) that (1) after he had tendered his resignation there was a discussion between them when the matter of acceptance of his resignation was amicably settled and that it was thereafter that he joined the Indian Express, (2) the letter of Karnik that there was no termination of his employment was not correct, (3) after 21st October, 1963 he had gone to the company's office to settle his accounts and collect the dues payable to him as also the letter of acceptance of his resignation but he was told that the accounts were not yet ready and he was not then paid even his salary and dearness allowance due up to 20th October, 1963 although "I had asked for these amounts at least", (4) the letter accepting his resignation was held back until he was prepared to sign a document "purporting to waive all my rights to leave salary" which he had first refused to sign, (5) on receiving the said letter of Karnik, he had thought necessary to get a written acceptance of resignation, that, as apprehended by him, that letter was handed over to him on that day only after he accepted a cheque for Rs. 2,810.47 P. and had given receipt therefor "in full and final settlement of all my claims" and that he wanted to specify in that receipt that full and final settlement on his side did not include compensation for one month's leave due to him but the accountant did not allow him to do so. The statement of account which was given to the respondent on 21st November, 1963 and on which he signed the said receipt stated that he had received the said cheque "in full and final settlement of all my claims against the company subject to the bonus for 1963 if declared and payable to me. The statement of account mentioned Rs. 901.34 only as remuneration for 20 days of October, 1963 on the basis of his monthly remuneration being Rs. 1,397, comprised of Rs. 700 as basic salary, Rs. 497 as dearness allowance and Rs. 200 as car allowance. The Statement of account thus shows that though he was on leave in October 1963, the company included the car allowance while calculating his wages due for these 20 days. But it also shows that no compensation for leave due to him was paid and further that in calculating the gratuity payable to him the monetary value of free telephone and free newspapers and the car allowance were not included as part of his wages. In reply to the respondent's letter of 21st November, 1963, the said Roy, by his letter of 5th December, 1963, wrote that as the respondent had not taken away the company's letter of acceptance of resignation by the time Karnik addressed the said letter Karnik was "right on facts" but, in view of the settlement of his affairs and the subsequent settlement of accounts, "it was better to forget the past and part amicably." He also made it clear that the respondent's claim for leave compensation was not admissible under the company's rules. The respondent thereafter applied to the Delhi Administration and the latter as aforesaid, referred his claim to the Labour Court for adjudication. In his statement of claim before the Labour Court, the respondent claimed that the monthly wages payable to him were Rs. 700 basic, Rs. 497 as dearness allowance, Rs. 200 conveyance allowance and Rs. 50 being the estimated value of the benefit of a free telephone and newspapers, aggregating Rs. 1,447 per month. He claimed gratuity computable on the basis of Rs. 1,447 as being his monthly wages Rs. 1,447 as compensation for the month's leave, in all Rs. 6,000.34 P. He did not deduct from the said claim the said said of amount of Rs. 2,810.47 P. as he had not encashed the cheque given to him against the receipt dated 21st November, 1963. The company in its written statement denied the claim relying on the said receipt and further denied that the car allowance and the monetary value for the free telephone and newspapers could be included in the wages payable to the respondent either as due to him or for calculating gratuity. Before the Labour Court the company did not dispute the value of the benefit of the free telephone and newspapers estimated by the respondent, but it raised the question whether the said value and the car allowance formed part of the respondent's wages and whether the amount of gratuity payable to him could be ascertained on the footing of their being part of his wages. The Labour Court held that there was no evidence that the car allowance was not payable to the respondent while he was on leave as was the case in respect of another working journalist, C.V. Vishwanath, whose claim also the Labour Court was trying along with that of the respondent. The Labour Court found this difference a significant one and held that the car allowance had to be taken as part of the wages. The Labour Court also held that the car allowance and the free telephone and newspapers were an allowance and an amenity respectively falling under the definition of section 2(rr) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, both forming the component parts of monthly wages payable to the respondent. As regards the leave, the respondent was undoubtedly entitled to 30 days leave. But the company's plea was, firstly, that its rules did not permit compensation for such leave and secondly, that it was set off against the period of notice which the respondent was required to give. No rules, however were produced to show that they contained any provision disallowing such compensation. As regards the notice period of one month, the Labour Court held that as the resignation dated 8th October, 1963 was accepted with effect from 21st October, 1963 there was compliance of 13 days only and therefore the management was not liable to pay for the balance of 17 days leave. The Labour Court rejected the company's plea that the receipt given by the respondent in full settlement of all his claims estopped him from making these claims on the ground that as these items were claimable under the Act there could be no estoppel against law. In the result, the Labour Court held that the respondent was entitled to claim car allowance of Rs. 200 per month Rs. 50 per month for telephone and newspapers and compensation for 13 days leave, that the first two were parts of his wages, that his monthly remuneration was, therefore Rs. 1,447 and gratuity equivalent to 5½ months wages would have to be calculated on the basis of Rs. 1,447 being his wages per month and directed the company to pay on the aforesaid calculations Rs. 2,002 over and above Rs. 2,810.47 for which the company had issued the said cheque.

The first contention raised by counsel for the company against the award was that the respondent, not being in the company's employment at the time he filed his claim in the Labour Court, was not a working journalist, and therefore, was not entitled to avail himself of the provisions of the Act. Section 2 (c) provides that:

"unless the context otherwise requires" a newspaper employee "means any working journalist, and includes any other person employed to do any work in, or in relation to, any newspaper establishment".

Clause (f) of that section defines a "working journalist" to mean a person whose principal avocation is that of a journalist and "who is employed as such in, or in relation to, any newspaper establishment." Clause (g) provides that all words and expressions used but not defined in this Act and defined in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 shall have the meanings respectively assigned to them in that Act. Counsel strenuously relied on the words "who is employed" as a journalist in, or in relation to, any newspaper establishment in clause (f) of section 2, his contention being that it is only a newspaper employee who is presently employed in a newspaper establishment who can resort to the Act and not an ex-employee whose employment has come to an end as a result of acceptance of his resignation. A question, similar to that raised by Counsel, also arose in *Western India Automobile Association v. Industrial Tribunal*¹. The contention there was that in the light of the definitions of "industrial dispute," and 'an employee' as they stood in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 before the Amending Act XXXVI of 1956 was passed, a dispute as to reinstatement of a discharged or dismissed workman could not fall within the scope of an industrial dispute. The contention was rejected. The Court observed that the definition of "industrial dispute" used the words "employment or non-employment", that whereas one was a positive, the other was a negative act of an employer, that such an act related to an existing employment or to an existing non-employment. After giving certain examples to illustrate the four stages when a dispute could arise, the Court at page 330 concluded thus :

“The failure to employ or the refusal to employ are actions on the part of the employer which would be covered by the term ‘employment or non-employment.’ Reinstatement is connected with non-employment and is therefore within the words of the definition. It will be a curious result if the view is taken that though a person discharged during a dispute is within the meaning of the word ‘workman’, yet if he raises a dispute about dismissal and reinstatement, it would be outside the words of the definition ‘in connection with employment or non-employment.’”

A similar question was canvassed in *Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd. v. Raghunath*¹ in connection with the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act XXIII of 1947. Section 2 (10) of that Act defined an ‘employee’ in terms indetical with those in the Industrial Disputes Act as it stood before the amendment in 1956, i.e., as meaning “any person employed by an employer to do any skilled or unskilled, manual or clerical work for contract or hire or reward in any industry and includes an employee discharged on account of any dispute relating to a change—whether before or after the discharge.” Section 2 (12) defined an ‘industrial dispute’ to mean “any dispute or difference connected with an industrial matter arising between employer and employee or between employers or employees.” It was not disputed that the question of reinstatement was an industrial dispute but the controversy was as to whether it was an industrial dispute as defined by section 2 (12) of that Act. The argument was that as the workman concerned was already dismissed and his employment had thereby come to an end, he could not be termed an employee as the intention of the Legislature could not be to include in the definition of an employee even those who had ceased to be in service as otherwise there was no need for the further provision in section 2 (10) which included those who were discharged from service on account of the dispute. The Court dismissed this contention following the decision in *Western India Automobile Association*² and held that a dispute between an employer and an employee regarding the latter’s dismissal and reinstatement would be an industrial dispute within section 2 (12) of that Act, that the inclusive clause in section 2 (10) was not an indication that dismissed employees would not fall within the meaning of ‘employee’ or that the question of their reinstatement would not be an industrial dispute and that that clause was inserted ex abundanti cautela to repeal a possible contention that employees discharged under sections 31 and 32 of the Act would not fall within the meaning of section 2 (10). Since the definitions of “an employee” in these two Acts were in language similar to the one used in the present Act, these decisions would be authorities for the view that an ex-employee would for the purposes of the present controversy be a working journalist.

It was, however, argued that though these two decisions considered a dismissed employee as a workman as defined by the Industrial Disputes Act and the C.P. and Berar Act, there are two decisions of this Court which express contrary views and that, therefore, there is a conflict of opinion which should be resolved by a larger bench. The two decisions relied on in this connection are: *Dharangadhara Chemical Works Ltd. v. State of Saurashtra*³ and *Workmen v. The Management of Dimakuchi Tea Estate*⁴. In *Dharangadhara Chemical Works Ltd.*³ the appellants were lessees holding a licence for manufacturing salt on the demised lands. The salt was manufactured by a class of professional labourers, known as ogaries, from rain water that got mixed up with saline matter in the soil. The work was seasonal and commenced after the rains and continued till June when the ogaries left for their villages. The demised lands were divided into plots which were allotted to the agarias with a sum of Rs. 400 for each plot to meet the initial expenses. Generally the same plot would be allotted to the same agarias every year, but if the plot was extensive in area it would be allotted to two agarias in partnership. After the manufacture of salt these agarias were paid at the rate of 0-5-6 per maund. Accounts would be settled at the end of each season and the agarias would be paid the balance due to them. These agarias worked together with the members of their families and were also free to engage extra labour on their own account, the appellant company having no concern therewith. No hours of work were prescribed, no muster rolls were maintained nor were working hours controlled by the appellant company. There were also no rules as regards leave or holidays and the agarias were free to go out of the factory after making arrangements for the manufacture of salt. On these facts the question was whether the agarias were workmen as defined by section 2 (s) or independent contractors. Bhagwati J. speaking for the Court, after quoting section 2 (s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, as it stood prior to its amendment in 1956, said thus :

"The essential Condition of a person being a workman within the terms of this definition is that he should be employed to do the work in that industry, that there should be, in other words, an employment of his by the employer and that there should be the relationship between the employer and him as between employer and employee or master and servant. Unless a person is thus employed there can be no question of his being a workman within the definition of the term as contained in the Act."

Relying in particular on the words "unless a person is thus employed", Counsel argued that this decision was at variance with what was said in the *Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd.*¹, and was, besides, an authority for the proposition that as the definition of a workman then stood, an ex-employee would not be a workman within the meaning of the Act. We are of the view that this decision does not warrant such a contention or that there is any conflict between this decision and the two earlier decisions. The question before the Court was the distinction between an employee and an independent contractor and it was only while describing the characteristics of the two relationships that the learned Judge observed that unless there was a relationship of master and servant and the person concerned "is employed" he could not be regarded as "a workman" as defined by the Act. The Court was not concerned in that case with the question posited in the *Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd.*², whether an employee who has been discharged or dismissed and who claims a relief such as reinstatement is a workman or not. Not having to consider such a question and being only concerned with the distinction between an employee and an independent contractor, the observations made by the Court to delineate the features of the two relationships cannot be regarded either as laying down that an ex-employee is not a workman or as being in conflict with the two earlier decisions which are specific decisions on the definition of "a workman" in the Act. In the case of *Workmen of Dimakuchi Tea Estate*³, the dispute related to the dismissal of one Dr. K.P. Bannerjee. The management in the written statement pleaded that Dr. Bannerjee was not a workman as defined by section 2 (s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, that therefore his dismissal could not be an industrial dispute as defined in section 2 (k) and the Tribunal could have no jurisdiction to decide whether the management were justified or not in dismissing the Doctor. The Tribunal as also the Labour Appellate Tribunal held, presumably because Dr. Bannerjee was not in the words of section 2 (s) a person employed in any industry to do any skilled or unskilled, manual or clerical work, that he was not workman within the meaning of section 2 (s), that the question of his dismissal was not an industrial dispute, and that therefore, his case was beyond the Tribunal's jurisdiction. The workman thereupon applied for Special Leave under Article 136 and though leave was granted, it was limited to the question whether a dispute in relation to a person who is not a workman was an industrial dispute as defined by section 2 (k) of the Industrial Disputes

2. (1958) S.C.J. 637; (1958) S.C.R. 1158.

Act, 1947. In view of the Special Leave being so limited, the Court proceeded on the assumption that Dr. Bannaijee was not "a workman" under the definition of that word as it then stood. The problem was, whether even so, the dispute regarding his dismissal could still be an industrial dispute, the contention of the workmen being that it would be so as by the use of the expression 'of any person' in the third part of section 2 (k) a dispute relating to a person, though not a workman, would be an industrial dispute. In answering this problem the Court entered into an elaborate discussion of the several provisions and the scheme of the Act and came to the conclusion that though the clause defining "industrial dispute" had used the expression "of any person", that expression must be given a restricted meaning, namely, that the dispute must be a real dispute between the parties thereto so as to be capable of settlement or adjudication by one party to the dispute giving necessary relief to the other and the person regarding whom the dispute was raised must be one in whose employment, non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour the parties to the dispute had a direct or substantial interest. In the absence of such an interest the dispute could not be said to be a real dispute between the parties. At page 1172 of the Report, the Court however, has made certain observations which apparently appear to be in variance with the *Western India Automobile Association*¹, and in the *Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd.*². The observations relied on by Counsel are as follows:—

"It is clear enough that prior to 1956 when the definition of 'workman' in the Act was further widened to include a person dismissed, discharged or retrenched in connection with, or as a consequence of the dispute or whose dismissal, discharge or retrenchment led to the dispute, a workman who had been discharged earlier and not during the dispute was not a workman within the meaning of the Act. If the expression "any person" in the third part of the definition clause were to be strictly equated with 'any workman', then there could be no industrial dispute, prior to 1956, with regard to a workman who had been discharged earlier than the dispute. That seems to be the reason why the Legislature used the expression 'any person' in the third part of the definition clause so as to put it beyond any doubt that the non-employment of such a dismissed workman was also within the ambit of an industrial dispute."

These observations, however, were made to show that as the definition of the workman stood before the 1956 amendment there was a gap between a workman and an employee, that though all workmen would be employees, the vice versa would not be correct as the supervisory staff would not fall within the definition of workman and that that gap was reduced to a certain extent by the Amendment Act of 1956 and that it would not be always correct to say that the workmen would have a direct and substantial interest in questions relating to all kinds of employees. At page 1173 S.K. Das J. observed :

"The expression 'any person' in the definition clause means, in our opinion, a person in whose employment, or non-employment, or terms of employment, or conditions of labour the workmen as a class have a direct or substantial interest—with whom they have, under the scheme of the Act, a community of interest."

While dealing with the decisions in *Western India Automobile Association*¹ and *Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd.*², the learned Judge clearly stated at page 1176 that the problem in those cases was whether an industrial dispute included within its ambit a dispute with regard to reinstatement of certain dismissed workmen, a problem quite different from the one before them and that the illustrations given by Mahajan, J. (as he then was) in the *Western India Automobile Association*¹, "to elucidate a different problem", could not be taken as determinative of a problem which was not before the Court in that case. The problem in each of these decisions being different and in view particularly of the fact that the case proceeded on the assumption that Dr. Bannerjee was not "a workman", it becomes difficult to agree that the observations relied on by Counsel were meant to be or are in fact in variance with those in the two earlier decisions, or that therefore, there is any conflict of opinion on the question that a workman whose services are terminated would still be a workman as defined by section 2 (a) before it was amended in 1956.

But assuming that there is such a conflict as contended, we do not have to resolve that conflict for the purposes of the problem before us. The definition section 2 of the present Act commences with the words "In this Act unless the context otherwise requires" and provides that the definitions of the various expressions will be those that are given there. Similar qualifying expressions are also to be found in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947 and certain other statutes dealing with industrial questions. It is, therefore, clear that the definitions of "a newspaper employee" and "a working journalist" have to be construed in the light of and subject to the context requiring otherwise. Section 5 of the Act, which confers the right to gratuity, itself contemplates in clause (d) of sub-section 1 a case of payment of gratuity to the nominee or the family of a working journalist who dies while he is in the service of a newspaper establishment. Section 17 (1) provides that where any amount is due under the Act to a newspaper employee from an employer, such an employee himself or a person authorised by him, or, in case of his death, any member of his family can apply to the State Government or other specified authority for the recovery thereof. Similar provisions are also to be found in section 33-C (1) of the Industrial Disputes Act. Claims under that section include those for compensation in cases of retrenchment, transfer of an undertaking and closure under Chapter V-A of that Act, all of which would necessarily be claims arising after termination of service and the claimant would obviously be one in all those cases who would not be presently employed in the establishment of the employer against whom such claims are made. Likewise, the claim for gratuity under section 17 read with section 5 of the Act would itself be one which accrues after the termination of employment. These provisions, therefore, clearly indicate that it is not only a newspaper employee presently employed in a particular newspaper establishment who can maintain an application for gratuity. The scheme of all these acts dealing with industrial questions is to permit an ex-employee to avail of the benefits of their provisions, the only requirement being that the claim in dispute must be one which has arisen or accrued whilst the claimant was in the employment of the person against whom it is made. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the definitions of a "newspaper employee" and "working journalist" being subject to a context to the contrary, the benefit of sections 5 and 17 is available to an ex-employee though he has ceased to be in the employment of that particular newspaper establishment at the time of his application for gratuity. The contention that the respondent was not entitled to maintain his application as he was not in the service of the appellant company on the date of his claim before the Labour Court cannot be sustained.

The next contention was that the respondent, having signed the said receipt in full settlement of all his claims and having thereby induced the company to accept his resignation without insisting on a full month's notice, was estopped from making claims in respect of his leave for one month, the car allowance and the free telephone and newspapers and for including them as part of his wages for calculating gratuity. Certain decisions of this Court seem, however, to have expressed doubt whether technical pleas such as acquiescence, estoppel and waiver suitably apply to industrial adjudication. But assuming that the rule of estoppel, as incorporated in section 115 of the Evidence Act, were to apply, the foundation of that rule is that it is inequitable and unjust to a person, that if another person by a representation induces him to act as he would not have otherwise acted, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny the effect of his former statement to the loss and injury of the person who has acted on it. [see Sarat v. Gopal].¹ The rule is one of evidence only and does not create any substantive right or confer any cause of action on the other. It comes into operation if a statement as to the existence of a fact has been made with the intention that the other person to whom it is made should believe and act on it and that that another person does in fact act upon the faith of it. The question whether the respondent is estopped from making his said claims may be looked at firstly, as regards his leave period and secondly, as regards his claims for car allowance and free telephone and newspapers. As to the claim for leave due to him, the record of the case makes it clear that he had been making that claim from the very outset. Though the receipt given by him mentions that it was given in full settlement of all his claims, the respondent on that very day in his letter Exhibit W-4 to the said Roy protested that though he wanted to clarify in that receipt that it was in full settlement of his salary and dearness allowance for the 20 days of October 1963 and gratuity only, he was not allowed to make that reservation although he had already preferred his claim for compensation for one month's leave due to him. We must note that though this letter went in as Exhibit W-4 before the Labour Court the company led no evidence to controvert the statements made therein. The reason for not doing so seems to be that the respondent had made the claim before one Mitra, the accountant in the Delhi office, and that claim was a matter of dispute. This position emerges from Roy's reply dated 5th December, 1963 to the respondent's said letter of 21st November, 1963 wherein the stand taken by Roy was that the respondent was not entitled to compensation for leave, not because he had given up that claim when he had signed the said receipt, but because the company's rules did not permit such compensation. It is, therefore manifest that the respondent did not make an representation when he signed the said receipt that he had waived his claim for leave period or that the company did any act on any such representation which otherwise it would not have done. In spite of the letter Exhibit W-4, the company failed to produce before the Labour Court its rules under which it was said that such a claim was not permissible. In its special leave petition in this Court, the company, however, cited a rule but we could take no notice of it as no application for producing the rules or proving them as additional evidence was made and it was hardly fair or just to take notice of it at such a late stage without an opportunity to the respondent to verify or controvert it. Roy's reply also indicates that the company's case, that the respondent's claim for compensation for leave was at the time of preparing his statement of account adjusted or set-off against its claim for the notice period, could not be correct. For, if that was so, would have straightaway said so in his said reply, or in any event the company would have led evidence of its accountant to that effect before the Labour Court. The rule of estoppel thus could not be invoked against the claim for compensation for leave period.

We next examine the question whether the respondent was precluded from making the rest of his claim. The burden of proving the ingredients of section 115 of the Evidence Act lies on the party claiming estoppel. The representation which is the basis for the rule must be clear and unambiguous and not indefinite, upon which the party relying on it is said to have, in good faith and in belief of it, acted. The statement of account prepared at the time when the respondent gave the said receipt appears to indicate that the benefit of the free telephone and newspapers and the car allowance were not taken into account and gratuity due to the respondent was calculated on the amount of pay being comprised of basic wages and dearness allowance only. But the inference that the respondent had given up his aforesaid claims when he passed the said receipt appears to be rebutted by the following facts : (1) though the resignation was accepted on 21st October, 1963 the letter of acceptance was not communicated to the respondent till 21st November, 1963 when the company obtained from the respondent the said receipt ; (2) in the meantime, the respondent received Karnik's said letter of 19th November, 1963 to the effect that there was no termination of the respondent's service in the absence of a month's notice, and on receipt of which, according to the respondent, he considered it necessary to secure the letter of acceptance of his resignation from the company. If the termination of his service depended on the giving of a month's notice, how was it that the company's manager, D'Souza, had accepted the resignation and signed the letter of acceptance Exhibit W-1 on 21st October, 1963; (3) the company was aware, as Karnik's said letter (of 19th November, 1963 shows that) the respondent had joined the Indian Express on 23rd October, 1963. The respondent's case was that it was after he was told that his resignation had been accepted that he joined that Indian Express. But when he received Karnik's said letter he decided that he could not rest content without jeopardising his interests on the mere oral intimation of acceptance of his resignation, and therefore, went to the company's office to secure a written acceptance when he was told that unless he passed a receipt in full settlement of his claims, the letter of acceptance would not be issued to him. There appears to be two good reasons why the respondent's case cannot be easily discarded. Firstly, since his resignation was accepted with effect from 21st October, 1963 and even a letter to that effect was made ready and signed by the company's manager, it would ordinarily have been communicated to him. If the company had any claim against him or if it wanted that his account should be settled before the letter was issued to him, surely an intimation to that effect would have been given to him. Secondly, though the respondent had put on record his version as to how the said receipt was obtained from him as early as 21st November, 1963, i.e., on the very day that the said receipt was secured from him, no refutation of any of the allegations in that letter is to be found in Roy's reply to it dated 5th December, 1963 save that the respondent's claim for compensation for leave period was not admissible under the company's rules. It is significant that there was no denial in that reply that the receipt was obtained from the respondent in the manner alleged in the said letter dated 21st November, 1963. Even at the later stages the company did not examine its accountant before the Labour Court to refute the said allegations. The statements of the respondent in that letter having thus remained unchallenged, the Labour Court could not reject them. In these circumstances it becomes doubtful whether he could be said to have been estopped from making the said claims on the ground only of the said receipt, if that receipt was obtained, as alleged by him, under the stress of circumstances. In this connection the fact that he kept the said cheque uncashed is not totally without relevance. Under section 115 of the Evidence Act the representation which estops a person making it from acting contrary to it is one on the belief of which the other person acts in a manner he would not have done but for it and on believing it to be true. Such a conclusion is difficult in face of the uncontradicted statements in the letter Exhibit W-4 that the management would not give him the letter of acceptance of his resignation unless he signed the said receipt in full settlement of all his claims. The plea of estoppel made on behalf of the company, therefore cannot be accepted.

The third contention was that the monetary value of the free telephone and newspapers and the car allowance could not be included as part of his wages for calculating gratuity. The value in terms of money of the benefit of free telephone and free newspapers, as estimated by the respondent, was not in question. But the argument was that this benefit as also the car allowance were given to the respondent by way of reimbursement for expenses which as a special correspondent he would otherwise have had to incur for the proper and efficient discharge of his duties. The two items, therefore, were neither an allowance nor an amenity. The facts, however, are that the telephone was installed by the company at the respondent's residence and stood in his and not in the company's name. All payments connected with it, including charges for calls, were made by the company. There was no restriction that he could use the telephone only for his official work or that he could not use it for personal calls. He was not called upon to keep an account of personal calls, the payment of which he would be called upon to make. Nor was any estimated amount for such personal calls either demanded or deducted from his wages. The newspapers were subscribed by the respondent but the bills for them were paid by the company. It was not the case of the company that the bills for them would be paid by it provided they were made use of by the respondent for his work as a special correspondent. As regards the car allowance, the car belonged to and stood registered in his name but the company paid him a monthly allowance of Rs. 200. There was no evidence whatsoever, not even a suggestion in the correspondence, that that amount was estimated as being equivalent to the expenses of conveyance which the respondent would incur in the discharge of his duties. No such indication is to be found in the company's evidence, nor was such a suggestion put to the respondent when he examined himself before the Labour Court.

Since wages has not been defined in the Act, its meaning is the same as assigned to it in the Industrial Disputes Act. Under section 2 (rr) of that Act, 'wages' means all remuneration capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of employment, expressed or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a workman in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment, and includes (i) such allowances (including dearness allowance) as the workman is for the time being entitled to; (ii) the value of any house accommodation, or of supply of light, water, medical attendance or other amenity or of any service or of any concessional supply of food-grains or other articles; (iii) any travelling concession; but does not include any bonus and other items mentioned therein. Mr. Ramamurthi's argument was that the car allowance as also the benefit of the free telephone and newspapers would fall under the first part of the definition as they are remuneration capable of being expressed in terms of money. The argument, however, cannot be accepted as neither of them can be said to be remuneration payable in respect of employment or work done in such employment. Neither the car allowance nor the benefit of the free telephone was given to the respondent in respect of his employment or work done in such employment as the use of the car and the telephone was not restricted to the employment, or the work of the respondent as the special correspondent. There was no evidence that the car allowance was fixed after taking into consideration the expenses which he would have ordinarily to incur in connection with his employment or the work done in such employment. Even if the respondent had not used the car conveying himself to the office or to other places connected with his employment and had used other alternative or cheaper means of conveyances or none at all, the car allowance would still have had to be paid. So too, the bills for the telephone and the newspapers whether he used them or not in connection with his employment or his work as the special correspondent. Therefore, we have to turn to the latter part of the definition and see if the two items properly fall thereunder. So far as the car allowance is concerned, there was, as aforesaid, nothing to suggest that it was paid to reimburse him of the expenses of conveyance which he would have to incur for discharging his duties as the special correspondent, or that it was anything else than an allowance within the meaning of section 2 (rr) of that Act. It would, therefore, fall under the inclusive part (i) of the definition. Likewise the benefit of the telephone and newspapers was allowed to the respondent not merely for the use thereof in connection with his employment or duties connected with it. Both the car allowance and the benefit of the free telephone and newspapers appear to have been allowed to him to directly reduce the expenditure which would otherwise have gone into his family budget and were therefore items relevant in fixation of fair wages. (See *Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd. v. Workmen*¹). That being the position, the two items could on the facts and circumstances of the present case be properly regarded as part of the respondent's wages and had to be taken into calculations of the gratuity payable to him.

These were the only points raised before us and since in our judgment none of them can be upheld the appeal must fail and has to be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—J. M. SHELAT, V. BHARGAVA AND C. A. VAIDIALINGAM, JJ.

Workmen of Orient Paper Mills Ltd.

... Appellants*

M/s. Orient Paper Mills Ltd.

... Respondent.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), section 2 (rr), Schedule 3, item 1—Wages—Regions—Com industry Principle inapplicable—Procedure to be followed in fixing wages.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947)—Dearness allowance—Linking with Price index—Discretion of the Tribunal.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947)—Wages—Casual worker cannot expect same wages as permanent employee.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947)—Bonus—Calculation of—Accounts not completed at the time of reference—Full Bench formula inapplicable—Tribunal is expected to decide dispute only as referred to it.

On facts held, that the region-cum-industry Principle laid down in the case of French Motorcar Co., Ltd. v. Workmen, (1963) 2 S.C.R. (Supp.) 16 could not have been applied by the Tribunal when fixing the wages in the company. In such a case the principle laid down in (1963) 2 S.C.R. (Supp.) 16 that the wages paid in that region in other industries as are nearly similar as possible to the line of business carried on by the concern should be taken into account. When applying the principles of fixing the minimum wage primarily on the basis of comparison between different industries to the same regions, wages payable in same industry in other parts of the country should not be considered.

An industrial Tribunal has the discretion in appropriate cases, of making a direction linking the dearness allowance element of a wage to the price index; but, at the same time, the Tribunal is entitled to choose the alternative course of fixing the wage at the prevailing price index and leaving the labour to raise a fresh demand and, if necessary a fresh industrial dispute for further rise in wages, in case there is marked variation in the Price index and the wage fixed in the award becomes outdated.

By the very nature of employment being casual, it can be presumed that a casual worker is on a lower footing and cannot expect the same wages as a permanent employee.

At the time of the reference, there could be no question of applying the Full Bench formula for calculation of surplus, because there were no completed accounts for the two years 1962—63 & 1963—64. This circumstance makes it clear that the claim for higher bonus could not, at the time of reference, have been based on the availability of surplus according to the Full Bench formula. The Tribunal was, therefore quite correct in not trying to work out the surplus according to the Full Bench formula and in awarding bonus on that basis. The Tribunal was expected to decide the dispute only as referred to it and at the time of reference at least there was not and there could not possibly be a claim for higher bonus on the basis of the application of the Full Bench formula.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Award dated the 11th and 13th January, 1964 of the Industrial Tribunal, Orissa, Cuttack in Industrial Dispute Case No. 8 of 1962.

D. L. Sengupta, Janardan Sharma, Anil Das Chowdhury and S. K. Nandy, Advocates, for Appellants.

H. R. Gokhale, Senior Advocate, (K. Gobind Das, N. C. Shah, Miss Krishna Sen and T. Gopalakrishnan, Advocates, with him), for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Bhargava, J.—The workmen of Orient Paper Mills Ltd., Brajrajnagar, have come up in this appeal by Special Leave against an award of the Industrial Tribunal, Orissa. An industrial dispute between these workmen and the management of Orient Paper Mills Ltd., (hereinafter referred to as "the Company") was referred by the State Government under section 10 (1) (d) of the Industrial Disputes Act (hereinafter referred to as "the Act") for adjudication by the Tribunal enumerating 30 different items of dispute. The Tribunal gave its award on all the thirty items. The Special Leave in this Court was sought and granted in respect of two matters covering some of these items. The first matter related to fixation of wages, including minimum wages, and this was covered by items Nos. 1, 3, 4, 22 and 26 in the schedule attached to the Order of Reference. The second matter in the appeal related to bonus covered by item No. 2 of that schedule. In the course of the hearing of the appeal, learned Counsel appearing on behalf of the workmen further gave up some of the points which were the subject-matter of the items mentioned above, so that in this judgment we need deal with only those points which were argued by him in support of the appeal.

The first and the main point argued with regard to wages was that the Tribunal, after holding that there was no identical industry in this region comparable with the Company, came to the view that there were other industries in the region in which minimum wages were higher than the minimum wages paid by the Company, but failed to fix the minimum wages in the award in accordance with the minimum wages being paid in those industries. Instead, what the Tribunal did was to work out the minimum wages, which should be paid, on an entirely different basis. It was also urged in the alternative that, even in adopting the latter course, the Tribunal committed an error inasmuch as, in making the calculation, the Tribunal only tried to neutralise about 36 per cent of the cost of living on the basis of the rise in price Index instead of permitting neutralisation to the extent of at least 90 per cent, which should have been done fixing the minimum wages for the lowest class of workmen.

The principle for fixation of minimum wages that should ordinarily be adopted was laid down by this Court in the case of *French Motor Car Co. Limited v. Workmen*¹, where it was held :—

"It is now well-settled that the principle of industry-cum-region has to be applied by an Industrial Court, when it proceeds to consider questions like wage structure, dearness allowance and similar conditions, of service. In applying that principle industrial Courts have to compare wage scales prevailing in similar concerns in the region with which it is dealing, and generally speaking similar concerns would be those in the same line of business as the concern with respect to which the dispute is under consideration. Further even in the same line of business, it would not be proper to compare (for example) a small struggling concern with a large flourishing concern."

The Tribunal, in giving its decision, took this principle in view, but came to the finding of fact that there were no other concerns in the same line of business as the Company in the region which could be compared with the Company. The Tribunal found that there are only two other paper mills, in the region. They are the Titaghur Paper Mill No. 3 situated at Chaudwar, and the J. K. Paper Mills at Rayagada. The Tribunal found that the Company is an old established business carrying on manufacture of paper on a very large scale. The Titaghur Paper Mills No. 3 started production only in April 1960, while the J. K. Paper Mills at Rayagada started production in 1961-62. These two paper mills were, therefore, both of very recent origin compared with the company. The strength of their labour-force and the annual production were also very much lower. Even the profits earned were much smaller. On these facts, the Tribunal held that it would not be proper to compare the wage structure for these paper mills with that of the Company. This is a finding of fact recorded by the Tribunal and nothing has been shown by learned Counsel for the Company which would induce us to interfere with this finding of fact. In fact, learned Counsel was unable to urge that this finding of fact suffered from any error at all. On this finding, it is clear that the region-cum-industry principle laid down in the case of *French Motor Car Co. Ltd.*¹ could not have been applied by the Tribunal when fixing the wages in the company.

This Court in the same case of *the French Motor Car Co.*¹, further indicated what principles should be adopted in such a situation where there is no concern in the same industry in the region comparable with the concern in which wages have to be fixed. That situation was envisaged as occurring whenever the particular concern in question happens to be already paying the highest wages in its particular line of business. It was held that in such a case :

“there should be greater emphasis on the region part of the industry-cum-region principle, though it would be the duty of the industrial Court to see that for purposes of comparison such other industries in the region are taken into account as are as nearly similar to the concern before it as possible. Though, therefore, in a case where a particular concern is already paying the highest wages in its own line of business, the industrial Courts would be justified in looking at wages paid in that region in other lines of business, it should take care to see that the concerns from other lines of business taken into account are such as are as nearly similar as possible, to the line of business carried on by the concern before it. It should also take care to see that such concerns are not so disproportionately large as to afford no proper basis for comparison.”

In the light of these views which were brought to the notice of the Tribunal, the Tribunal proceeded to consider the minimum wages paid by three collieries, Orient Colliery, Ibe Colliery and Hingiri-Rampur Colliery, the Rourkela Steel Plant, the Cement Factory at Rajgangpur and the Indian Aluminium Company, Hirakud which the Tribunal found were situated not very far away from the place where the Company had its factory. The Tribunal mentioned that, according to the Coal Award, the minimum wage in the collieries at the then existing price index was Rs. 93-7-0; in the cement factory Rs. 96.83 in the Steel Plant Rs. 95 and in the aluminium company Rs. 97.84 nP. The Tribunal then also took into account the minimum wages being paid by the other paper mills situated outside the region and thereafter recorded its own decision in the following words :—

“The conclusion that flows from these figures is that the lowest paid worker in the paper mill at Brajrajnagar gets more than what is paid as minimum wage in the other two Paper Mills of Orissa, but it is less than what is paid to the lowest paid worker in some of the Paper Mills outside the State. In other industries, which are comparatively close to the paper industry of at Brajrajnagar, the minimum wage is above Rs. 90 in almost all the cases.”

On the basis of this finding of fact, the Tribunal held that, if the minimum wage in the Company is to be fixed more on the basis of the minimum wage prevailing in other industries in that region which, in its opinion, would be appropriate under the circumstances of the case, then, a revision was really necessary. We think that the criticism of learned Counsel for the workmen that the Tribunal committed an error at this stage in merely holding that the facts found by it justified a revision and in not proceeding to fix minimum wages on the basis of the other industries in the region, is fully justified. It is to be noted that there is no mention in the award of the Tribunal that the company at any stage put forward the case that the collieries, the steel plant, the cement factory, and the aluminium company were concerns which were not comparable with the Company. In fact, in the course of arguments before us, we asked learned Counsel for the Company to point out whether such a plea was taken at any stage by the Company and whether evidence was led to show that these concerns were not comparable with the Company. Learned Counsel had to admit that no specific plea was taken by the Company in this behalf and at least no evidence at all was led to show that these concerns were not comparable with the Company. The workmen in their written statement had relied on the wage structure in these concerns obviously on the basis that they were comparable. Since the Company never took the plea that they were not comparable, no occasion arose for the workmen to give evidence of the concerns being comparable. In fact, the Tribunal also accepted them as being comparable and that is why, in its conclusion, the Tribunal held that, in its opinion, it would be appropriate under the circumstances of the case to fix the minimum wage in the Company on the basis of the minimum wage prevailing in other industries in that region. By the expression "other industries in the region" the Tribunal was obviously referring to these concerns. Having come to this view, it is clear that, to give full effect to the principle laid down by this Court in the case of *French Motor Car Co.*¹, the Tribunal should have proceeded to fix the minimum wage in the Company on the basis of the average minimum wage prevailing in these concerns. We have already quoted the figures of the minimum wage prevailing in these concerns. On their basis, it appears to us that there will be full justification for fixing the minimum wage in the company at Rs. 95 per mensem which is about the average of the wages prevailing in all those concerns. In this connection, we may take notice of the fact that, in the written statement of the workmen, the minimum wages prevailing in these concerns were shown at figures lower than those mentioned by the Tribunal; but it appears that those lower figures were given, because the wages mentioned in the written statement were based on a lower price index. The Tribunal considered the minimum wages in these concerns on the basis of the prevailing Price Index of 441 at Sambalpur taking too as the basic price index for the year 1939. Even when fixing the minimum wage for the company, on the basis of the alternative calculation made by the Tribunal, the Tribunal has proceeded on the assumption that the minimum wage is being fixed for the Price Index No. 441 prevailing at the time of the award taking 100 as the basic index for the year 1939. In these circumstances we think that the minimum wage in the Company should have been fixed by the Tribunal at Rs. 95 per mensem, following the principle laid down by this Court in the case of *French Motor Car Co.*¹. The Tribunal should not have proceeded to make the alternative calculation on some other basis so as to arrive at a lower figure of Rs. 73 per mensem as the wage covering the basic wage and the dearness allowance, in addition to Rs. 11 per mensem payable as production bonus.

Learned Counsel for the Company urged before us that the principle of fixation of wages on the basis of comparison in the region laid down in the *French Motor Car Co.'s case*¹ is not rigid, and it is not necessary that the minimum wage in the Company must be fixed at the average level of wages in the other comparable industries in the region. According to him note should be taken of the fact that, at least in the paper industry in this area, the other concerns are paying much lower wages. This point has to be rejected straightaway in view of the finding that those concerns are very small and not comparable with the company. It was also urged that, in fixing the minimum wage, the wages payable in the paper industry in other parts of the country should also be kept in view. We do not think that such a consideration should be taken into account when applying the principle of fixing the minimum wage primarily on the basis of comparison between different industries in the same region. Finally, it was argued that other amenities being provided by the Company should also be taken into account when fixing the minimum wage. In this case, however, there is nothing to show that the Company is providing any such amenities which are different from the amenities that are being provided by those concerns in the region which are being compared with the Company for the purpose of fixation of the minimum wage. Consequently, we do not think that there is any justification for departing from the figure of Rs. 95 which is the average minimum wage paid by those industries.

We may, at this stage, take notice of the fact that, in considering the question of minimum wage, the Tribunal had in view the total wage packet to be received by each workman and, in the opinion of the Tribunal, it consisted of three elements. These elements are basic wage, dearness allowance and production bonus. The Tribunal in its award, held that the minimum wage, insofar as it consists of basic wage and dearness allowance, should be fixed at Rs. 73 and there should be paid, in addition, production bonus to the extent of Rs. 11 in each case. Thus, the total minimum wage packet which a workman should be entitled to receive was fixed by the Tribunal at Rs. 84. It is for this figure of Rs. 84 that we think the Tribunal should have substituted the figure of Rs. 95. From the facts noted in the Award or appearing on the record, it appears that production bonus, in addition to the minimum wage, is payable in the case of Aluminium Company, Hirakud ; but there does not appear to be any production bonus payable in the three Collieries, in the Steel Plant and in the Cement Factory. In the majority of the industries, which are being compared with the Company in the region, consequently, the minimum wage is the total wage packet receivable by the workman and there is no extra amount received as production bonus. There is only an exception in the case of Indian Aluminium Company. That particular Company, it appears, has some special features which have been brought out in the evidence of the Management's witness, B.B. Panda. He has stated that the Aluminium Factory at Hirakud carries on its work with the help of highly automatic machines and is supplied electricity by the Government at subsidised rates. The nature of work is such that the total number of workmen employed does not exceed 125 which is a very small number as compared with the number of workmen employed by the Company. It is clear that, in the Aluminium Factory the number of workmen who have to be paid production bonus is very small and almost insignificant as compared with the number in the Company. In these circumstances, it would be more appropriate to compare the total wage packet of the Company with the wage packet received by the workmen of other industries in the region, viz., the three Collieries, the Rourkela Steel Plant, and the Cement Factory at Rungtampur. Comparing with them, there is justification for fixing the total wage packet of the workmen in the Company at Rs. 95 which would include production bonus. So far as annual profit bonus is concerned, it is payable in the Company also as in those other concerns. Consequently, in varying the award of the Tribunal, we would direct that the total minimum wage packet of a workman in the Company shall be fixed at Rs. 95 consisting of the three elements of basic wage, dearness allowance and production bonus.

The break-up of this wage into the three elements is of some importance in this case because of the principle on which the profit bonus is paid by this Company. The profit bonus that is paid is three months basic wage and does not take into account the dearness allowance and the production bonus elements of the total wage. The Company has always treated the total wage of a workman as consisting of these three elements in the proportion of 3:3:1. On behalf of the workmen, it was urged before the Tribunal that the proportion should be 3:1:1, so that the production bonus and the dearness allowance would both be equal and 1/3rd of the basic wage. This plea of the workmen was rejected by the Tribunal primarily on the ground that the other break-up urged on behalf of the Company was the break-up which had been accepted by mutual consent between the workmen and the Company in an earlier settlement which had been arrived at in the year 1959. We are unable to hold that the Tribunal committed any error in arriving at this decision and, consequently, the total minimum wage fixed by us must also be deemed to have the same break-up. As a result, it would have to be held that the total minimum wage of Rs. 95. will consist of Rs. 41 as basic wage, Rs. 41 as dearness allowance and Rs. 13 as production bonus.

In connection with the fixation of minimum wage, one point vehemently argued by learned Counsel for the workmen was that at least the dearness allowance element of the wage should have been made variable with the Price Index, so that the labour could automatically be compensated for further rise in the cost of living subsequent to the making of the award. Learned Counsel was, however, unable to show to us that this Court or any other Tribunal has ever laid down the principle that, where the dearness allowance forms a part of the consolidated wage fixed, there should be such linking so as to bring in continuous variation of the wage, depending on the variation in the Price Index. It appears to us that an Industrial Tribunal has the discretion, in appropriate cases, of making a direction linking the dearness allowance element of a wage to the Price Index; but, at the same time, the Tribunal is entitled to choose the alternative course of fixing the wage at the prevailing Price Index and leaving the labour to raise a fresh demand and, if necessary, a fresh industrial dispute for further rise in wages, in case there is marked variation in the Price Index and the wage fixed in the award becomes out-dated. Reference in this connection may be made to the decision of this Court in *Hydro (Engineers) Pvt. Ltd. v. The Workmen*¹, where also the Court did not hold that it was compulsory to link minimum wage with the cost of living index and only envisaged that such linking may be permissible by holding:

"It is thus clear that the concept of minimum wage does take in the factor of the prevailing cost of essential commodities whenever such minimum wage is to be fixed. The idea of fixing such wage in the light of cost of living at a particular juncture of time and of neutralising the rising prices of essential commodities by linking up scales of minimum wages with the cost of living index cannot, therefore, be said to be alien to the concept of a minimum wage."

In the present case, the Tribunal chose the course of leaving it to the workmen to ask for increase in minimum wage on any further rise in Price Index and did not consider it advisable to link the wages with it. In fact, from the Award, it appears that, so far as the Tribunal was concerned, the workmen did not press for such linking when the award was being given. Consequently, we are unable to hold that the Tribunal has committed any error and that, in this respect, any interference by us is called for.

The only other point argued before us in respect of wages by learned Counsel was that casual workers should also be paid minimum wages on the same basis as the permanent workers for whom the minimum wage was fixed by the Tribunal which is being varied by us by increasing it to a total wage packet of Rs. 95. It appears that the Tribunal did not accept this demand primarily on the ground that the distinction between casual workers and the permanent workers was recognised by both the parties in the agreement of 1959. It may be noticed that, by the very nature of employment being casual, it can be presumed that a casual worker is on a lower footing and cannot expect the same wages as a permanent employee. Therefore the decision by the Tribunal not to equate the casual workers with the permanent employees cannot be held to be incorrect and must be upheld.

The Tribunal had directed that the increase of Rs. 12 per mensem in the total minimum wage packet allowed by it will ensure to the benefit of the lowest paid female, Badli and permanent daily-rated workers also. This principle will remain effective with the modification that these workers will be entitled to the increase of Rs. 23 per mensem substituted by us for the increase of Rs. 12 allowed by the Tribunal.

Learned Counsel appearing for the Company drew our attention to the fact that the revised wages are payable with effect from 13th December, 1962 and, by this time, a period of 5 to 6 years has elapsed, so that the Company will have to pay arrears of wages for this long period. It was urged that this would cast a very heavy burden on the Company. We do not think that this reason advanced on behalf of the Company will justify our making a direction that the increase in wages should be effective from some later date. The previous agreement of 1959 was binding only up to 12th December, 1962, and we think that the Tribunal was right in directing that the revised wages must take effect from 13th December, 1962. Even though arrears will have to be paid for about 6 years, it has to be kept in view that, since then, there has been a very considerable rise in the Price Index and the labour has not so far raised a fresh dispute for a further revision of wages over and above the wages fixed by the Tribunal which are being now re-fixed by us. In all these circumstances, we think that the revised wages should take effect from 13th December, 1962.

1. Since reported in (1969) 1 S.C.J. 519.

The only other dispute raised in this appeal related to the bonus for the year 1962-63. Initially, the workmen had challenged the decision of the Tribunal with regard to bonus for all the five years from 1959-60 to 1963-64, but in the course of arguments, at the last stage before us, learned Counsel for the workmen confined his arguments to the bonus for the year 1962-63 only. The main point urged by learned Counsel was that, in giving the decision with regard to bonus for this year, the Tribunal committed the error of not making calculation of surplus available on the basis of the Full Bench Formula approved by this Court in the case of *The Associated Cement Companies Ltd., Dwarka Cement Works, Dwarka v. Its Workmen and another*¹. The Company is paying profit bonus equivalent to three months' basic wage of each workman. The demand made by the workmen was for bonus equivalent to six months' wages, and the argument was that, if the Tribunal had worked out the surplus available on the correct basis, that surplus would have certainly justified grant of profit bonus at six months' wages.

This argument fails, because it appears to us that the demand, as put forward before the Tribunal for bonus equivalent to six months' wages, was, in fact, never made by the workmen on the basis that the surplus calculated under the Full Bench Formula would justify bonus being granted at that rate. The Tribunal, in this connection, has quited the pleading of the workmen in their written statement before it. The pleading makes it clear that the claim for six months' wages was not based on the Full Bench Formula, but on the ground that certain clerical staff was, being paid bonus which, in effect, amounted to about six months' basic wages, because the bonus was calculated in their case by taking into account the consolidated wages, including dearness allowance, while in the case of the workmen, the dearness allowance element of the wages was being ignored and bonus was calculated only by taking into account basic wages. We agree with this interpretation of the pleadings of the workmen. Further, there is one very significant circumstance, viz., that this dispute was raised by the workmen before the expiry of the year 1962-63. Initially, there was an attempt that the dispute be referred to the Industrial Tribunal under section 10 (2) of the Act on the basis of an agreed enumeration of subjects of dispute drawn up by the workmen and the Company together. That reference under section 10 (2) of the Act, however, failed due to some technical defect. The reference was ultimately made by the Government under section 10 (1) of the Act, but it was made in the same form in which the parties had agreed to refer it. The reference was made by the Government on the 4th October, 1962. At that time, the year 1962-63 was still running and the accounts for that year could not possibly have been closed and made available. The balance-sheet and the profit and loss account of that year could only be prepared after the closure of the year on 31st March, 1963. In fact, the reference included a dispute even for the year 1963-64, which year had not even started running. On the face of it, at the time of the reference, there could be no question of applying the Full Bench Formula for calculation of surplus, because there were no completed accounts for the two years 1962-63 and 1963-64. This circumstance makes it clear that the claim for higher bonus could not, at the time of reference, have been based on the availability of surplus according to the Full Bench Formula. The Tribunal was, therefore, quite correct in not trying to work out the surplus according to the Full Bench Formula and in awarding bonus on that basis. In this connection, learned Counsel for the workmen urged that, at least by the time when the Award was given, the completed accounts for the year 1962-63 were available; but it seems to us that this circumstance is of no assistance. The award had to cover the year 1963-64 also and at least for that year the accounts could not possibly have been completed, as that year was still running when the award was given by the Tribunal on the 11th January, 1964. Further, the Tribunal was expected to decide the dispute only as referred to it and, at the time of reference at least, there was not and there could possibly not be a claim for higher bonus on the basis of the application of the Full Bench Formula.

The claim was, in fact, based on the circumstance that, according to the workmen, the bonus, in their case was being calculated as equivalent to three months' basic wages, while, in the case of some clerical staff, the calculation was made on the basis of their consolidated wages consisting of basic wages and dearness allowance. The argument is incorrect. In the case of even the lowest paid clerical staff, to whom dearness allowance is separately payable, the bonus is only calculated on the basis of basic wages, and the dearness allowance is ignored. There is some clerical staff which does not get any dearness allowance at all and it is only in those cases that the bonus is worked out on the basis of the total wages paid. In such cases, the calculation is still on the basis of basic wage, because it cannot be assumed that their wage is a consolidated wage consisting of the two elements of basic wage and dearness allowance lumped together. In fact, the principle which is being applied is the simple one of calculating the bonus payable at three months' basic wage in each case and in no case is the dearness allowance taken into account. There is, therefore, no discrimination or inequality as urged on behalf of the workmen.

Finally, it was urged that even the casual and Badli workers should be allowed bonus on the same basis as the permanent workers. The Tribunal rejected this demand on the ground that, under the Agreement of 1959, the workmen and the Company had agreed specifically to exclude these classes of workers in regard to payment of bonus. We are unable to hold that the Tribunal committed any error of law, requiring interference by us, in basing its decision on the principle contained in the earlier Agreement of the parties and in holding that there was no justification to introduce a new element of payment of bonus to casual and Badli workers at this stage. The claim in this respect also fails.

As a result, the appeal is only partly allowed inasmuch as the minimum wage fixed by the Tribunal in the Award is varied as indicated by us above. The rest of the Award of the Tribunal is upheld. Since, in this appeal, the principal dispute related to the fixation of minimum wage of the workmen and we are allowing the appeal of the workmen in that respect, we direct that the workmen, will be entitled to their costs of this appeal from the Company.

The Workmen of the Motor Industries Co., Ltd.

v.

The Management of Motor Industries Co., Ltd. and another

... Respondents.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), section 2 (p) and 18 (3)—Settlement, before conciliation officer between, management and Association of workmen—Settlement in representative capacity—Binding on workmen.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), sections 23 (1), 24 and 29—Distinction between strikes envisaged by section 23 (c) and section 25.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947)—Strike by workers—Management dismissing three workers for misconduct by incitement, intimidation and riotous and disorderly behaviour considering them as 'very grave nature'—Whether amounts to victimisation and discrimination.

The settlement was a Package settlement by which the management and the workmen, through their association, arrived at certain terms in the presence of the conciliation officer. The settlement arrived at by the Association must be regarded as one made by it in its representative character and therefore, binding on the workmen. If a lightening strike without notice is illegal under any provision of Law, standing order 22 would come into operation and starting or joining such a strike and inciting others to join it would amount to misconduct for which disciplinary action by the management would be possible.

Held, the settlement, was one as defined by section 2 (p) of the Industrial Disputes Act and was binding on the workmen under section 18 (3) of the Act until it was validly terminated and was in force when the said strike took place. The strike was a lightening one, was resorted to without notice and was not at the call of the Association and was, therefore, in breach of the settlement.

There is a distinction between a strike envisaged by section 23 (1) in respect of a matter covered by a settlement and a strike in breach of a settlement envisaged by section 29. A strike in breach of a contract during the operation of a settlement and in respect of a matter covered by that settlement falls under section 23 (c). But whereas section 26 punishes a workman for going on an illegal strike or for any act in furtherance of such a strike, section 29 lays down the penalty for a person, not necessarily a workman, who commits breach of a term of a settlement which is binding under the Act. Thus, commencing a strike or acting in furtherance of it in breach of a settlement binding on the person who so commences it or acts in its furtherance is an offence punishable under section 29.

On facts held, The strike was in the matter of the suspension of a workman pending a domestic enquiry against him, a matter which obviously was not one of the matters covered by the said settlement. It was, therefore, not a strike illegal under section 24 read with section 23 (c). However, the strike was in contravention of the settlement and that settlement being binding on the workmen concerned and in operation at the time was punishable under section 29, and therefore, illegal under that section. The strike was illegal not under section 24 but because it was in contravention after settlement binding on the workmen concerned. Consequently, standing order 22 would apply and participating in or inciting others to join such a strike would amount to misconduct for which the management were entitled to take disciplinary action.

The management took action only in respect of Acts falling under Clause 3 and 13 of the standing order 22 evidently for the reason that they considered incitement "intimidation and directions and disorderly behaviour as every grave in in nature." It cannot be said in taking this view the management discriminated against the three workmen were concerned as against the rest or that they dismissed with the object of victimising. An act of discrimination can only occur if amongst those equally situated an unequal treatment is meted out to one of more of them. Having been found to be the leaders of the crowd action against them cannot on any principle be regarded as discriminatory or unequal. Once a misconduct graver than that of the rest was found proved against these three workmen and for which the punishment is dismissal victimisation cannot legitimately be attributed to the management. So far as their participation in the strike and loitering about is concerned...no action was taken against these three workmen on the ground that those acts were common with those of the rest of the workmen. Held, the order of dismissal cannot be characterised as acts of victimisation.¹

Appeal by Special Leave from the Award dated the 23rd March, 1968 of the Labour Court, Bangalore in Reference No. 39 of 1967.

M. K. Ramamurthi, Senior Advocate (B. R. Dolia, S. Pappu and Vineet Kumar, Advocates, with him), for Appellants.

H. R. Gokhale, Senior Advocate, (C. Doraswamy and D. N. Gupta, Advocates, with him), for Respondent No. 1.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Shelat, J.—This appeal, founded on Special Leave, arises out of an industrial dispute between the respondent company and the Motor Industries Company Employees Association which the Government of Mysore referred to the Labour Court, Bangalore, for adjudication under section 10 (1) (c) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. The dispute related to the dismissal by the management of three workmen, Sandhyavoo, G. Prabhakar and M. V. Vasudevan out of the five workmen against whom the management had held a domestic enquiry at which they were found guilty of acts of misconduct charged against them.

The facts leading to the said dispute and the reference are as follows :

On 24th August, 1964, the said association handed over to the management a charter of demands. Negotiations between the parties having failed, the demands were taken before the conciliation officer when the parties arrived at a settlement dated 23rd December, 1964. On 29th April, 1966, the management issued a notice suspending for a day, i.e., 4th May, 1966, one B. G. Shenoy as and by way of penalty. In consequence of the protest by the association, the said suspension was postponed and on 10th May, 1966, the management served a charge-sheet on Shenoy and suspended him pending an enquiry. On 11th May, 1966, the association demanded withdrawal of the said suspension and the said charge-sheet. Discussions took place on that day from 9.45 A.M. to 12-30 P.M. between the association and the management and the parties thereafter adjourned at 1 P.M. for lunch having decided to resume the talks at 2. 30 P.M. At 2 P.M. the first shift ended and the workers of the second shift began to come in. The workmen of the first shift, however, stayed on and those of the second shift along with the workmen of the general shift joined them and all of them went on strike. The discussions which were resumed at 2-30 P.M. ended in an agreement at 5 P.M. and the workmen returned to work. On 18th May, 1966, the assistant establishment officer submitted a complaint to the chief personnel officer alleging certain acts of misconduct by a crowd of workmen mentioning therein the names of five of them including the said three workmen. On 25th May, 1966, charge-sheets alleging stoppage of work, abandoning the place of work, inciting clerks and officers of G. 2 department to join the said strike, disorderly behaviour including intimidation and assault on one. A Lakshman Rao, were served upon those five workmen. Correspondence thereafter ensued between the association and the management wherein the association protested against the management's decision to adopt disciplinary action against the said five workmen despite the agreement arrived at on 11th May, 1966. Thereafter, a domestic enquiry was held on 30th June, 1966, which was completed on 27th July, 1966, when the enquiry officer made his report holding the said three workmen, Sandhyavoo, Prabhakar and Vasudevan, guilty of acts of misconduct under standing order 22 (2) (3), (13) and (18). He exonerated the other two workmen except on the charge of participating in the strike and loitering about under clauses (2) and (18) of the said standing order on 12th August, 1969. Management, agreeing with the report, passed orders of dismissal against the said three workmen which gave rise to the said reference. On 23rd March, 1968, the Labour Court gave its award holding that the said enquiry was validly held and that the management were justified in passing the said orders of dismissal.

Mr. Ramamurthi, appearing for the association, challenged the said award on the following grounds : (1) that the said association not having given a call for the said strike, the said charges were misconceived and the orders of dismissal were consequently not sustainable ; (2) that the said strike, which was spontaneously staged by the workmen, was not illegal under section 24 of the Industrial Disputes Act, nor was it in contravention of any law as required by standing order 22 (2) and (3) ; (3) that the said disciplinary proceedings were in contravention of the agreement arrived at on 11th May, 1966, and therefore, the dismissal following such disciplinary proceedings amounted to unfair labour practice ; (4) that the orders of dismissal were passed on charges including that of intimidation though the misconduct of intimidation was not found proved by the enquiry officer and hence the said orders were illegal (5) that to punish only three workmen when a large number of workmen had taken part in staging the strike and in inciting others to join it constituted victimisation ; and (6) that the findings of the enquiry officer were based on no evidence or were perverse in that no reasonable body of persons could have arrived at them on the evidence before him.

The argument on which the first contention was based was that the settlement dated 23rd December, 1964, was arrived at between three parties, the management, the association and the workmen ; and that the association being the union registered under the Trade Unions Act was an entity distinct from the workmen. Under clause 5 of the settlement it was the association which was obliged to give four days notice if it decided to resort to strike, go slow tactics or other coercive action. The said clause did not impose any such obligation on the workmen. The workmen thus having no such obligation and the said strike being a spontaneous one, without any call for it from the association, it could not be said to be in breach of the said settlement, and therefore, would not fall under the mischief of section 23 of the Act, the first condition of which is that to be illegal under section 24 read with section 23 it must be in breach of a contract. Standing order 22 requires that participating in a strike would be misconduct if it is in breach of some provision of law. But as the strike was not in contravention of section 23, it would not constitute misconduct under that standing order. Therefore, the charges against the said three workmen were misconceived and the orders of dismissal passed against them on the basis that they stood established were bad. In our view this argument cannot be sustained. The construction of clause 5 of the settlement suggested by Mr. Ramamurthi is contrary to (a) the tenor of that settlement and (b) the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act under which a settlement arrived at between an employer and a union representing the employees during conciliation proceedings is binding not only on such union but also the workmen whom it represents and (c) the principles of collective bargaining recognised by industrial law. The settlement was a package settlement by which the management and the workmen, through their association, arrived at certain terms in the presence of the conciliation officer. The settlement, besides settling the demands contained in the said charter of demands, sets out the necessity of harmonious relations and of co-operation between the management and the workmen so as to promote higher and better production. It was to achieve this object that direct action on the part of either of them such as a strike by the workmen and a lock-out by the employer without notice was prohibited. Evidently the provision for four days' notice before any direct action was taken by either of them was provided for so that during that period if there was any grievance it could be ironed out by negotiation. Clause 5 of the settlement falls in two parts; (1) the substantive part, and (2) the corollary thereof. The first part inter alia provided that neither the association nor the management would resort to any direct action, such as strike, go-slow tactics or lock-out or any such coercive action without giving to the other a four days' notice. The second part provided an undertaking on the part of the association to co-operate with the management, if there was any strike by workmen without any call therefor from the association, if the management were to take disciplinary action against the workmen. If the construction of clause 5 suggested by Mr. Ramamurthi were to be accepted it would lead to a surprising result, namely, that though a strike at the instance of the association required four days' notice, a strike by the workmen without any call from the association would not require any such notice and that the settlement left complete liberty to the workmen to launch a sudden strike. Such a construction appears on the very face of it contrary to the object and purpose of the settlement and particularly clause 5 which envisaged a notice period of four days to enable the parties to resolve a dispute before direct action on its account is resorted to by either of them. The suggested construction is also untenable, for, surely the association irrespective of the workmen cannot by itself resort to any direct action. How can, for instance, the association resort to go-slow tactics without giving a call for it to the workmen. It is obvious, therefore, that clause 5 does not contemplate any dichotomy between the association and the workmen as suggested by Mr. Ramamurthi, besides being repugnant to the principle that a settlement arrived at by the association must be regarded as one made by it in its representative character, and therefore, binding on the workmen. Therefore, although the settlement mentions in clause 5 the management, workmen and the association, the expression "workmen" therein was unnecessary, for, without that expression also it would have been as efficaciously binding on the workmen as on the association. This conclusion is strengthened by the fact that the settlement mentions the management and the association on behalf of the workmen only as the parties thereto and the signatories thereto also are only the representatives of the two bodies. None of the workmen, nor any one separately representing them affixed his signature to it. If a lightening strike without notice is illegal under any provision of law (a question which we shall presently consider) standing order 22 would come into operation and starting or joining such a strike and inciting others to join it would amount to misconduct for which disciplinary action by the management would be possible.

The next question is whether the management could validly take disciplinary action against the workmen concerned in respect of the said strike. The recitals of the said settlement show that as a result of the association presenting the said charter of demands negotiations between the management and the association took place on the said demands as also on certain proposals made by the management, that on their failure conciliation proceedings took place in the course of which the parties arrived at the said settlement which, as aforesaid, was signed by the representatives of the management and the association in the presence of the conciliation officer. The settlement thus was one under section 12 (3) of the Industrial Disputes Act and rule 59 of the Rules made thereunder by the Government of Mysore. It was to come into force as from 1st January, 1965, and was to remain in force for three years and was thereafter to continue to be in force until its termination by either side. It is clear from Part I thereof that the object with which it was made was to promote harmonious relations and co-operation between the company, the association and the workmen so that the company may on the one hand be able to achieve increased production and on the other be in a position to afford maximum opportunity for continued employment. To accomplish these aims it was agreed that the company on its part should be managed on sound and progressive lines and the association and the workmen on their part should combat any wasteful practices adversely affecting workmanship and production and assist the management in apprehending persons responsible for acts such as theft, sabotage and other subversive activities. As clause 5 of the settlement itself states it was "in order to ensure continuation of smooth working" that the company and the association agreed that in no case would either of them resort to direct action such as lock-outs, strikes, go-slow and other coercive action without four days' notice and that should one or more workmen resort to any such direct action without the approval of the association, the association would cooperate with the company in any disciplinary action which the company would take against such workmen. Then follows the agreement on the said demands of the workmen, and the proposals made by the management in the details of which it is not necessary to go, and finally, the agreement that the parties would adhere to the code of discipline and the grievance procedure annexed as annexure IV to the settlement. The said code also inter alia, provided that there should be no strike or lock-out without notice, that neither party should resort to coercion, intimidation, victimisation or go-slow tactics, that they would avoid litigation, sit-down and stay-in strikes and lock-outs and would not permit demonstrations which are not peaceful or rowdysim. Read in the context of the other provisions of Part I of the settlement of which it is part, clause 5 was intended to prohibit (a) direct action without notice by or at the instance of the association, and (b) strikes by workmen themselves without the approval of the association. The words "in no case" used in the clause emphasist that direct action by either party without notice should not be resorted to for any reason whatsoever. There can be no doubt that the settlement was one as defined by section 2 (p) of the Industrial Disputes Act and was binding on the workmen under section 18 (3) of the Act until it was validly terminated and was in force when the said strike took place. The strike was a lightening one, was resorted to without notice and was not at the call of the association and was, therefore, in breach of clause 5.

Could the management then take disciplinary action against the concerned workmen in respect of such a strike standing order 22 enumerates various acts constituting misconduct. Clauses 2, 3, 13 and 18 provide that striking either singly or in combination with others in contravention of the provisions of any Act, inciting any other workmen to strike in contravention of any law, riotous or disorderly behaviour or any act subversive of discipline and loitering within the company's premises while on duty or absence without permission from the appointed place of work constitute misconduct. The point is whether participation in and incitement to join the said strike were in respect of a strike which was in contravention of any Act or law. Section 23 provides that no workman employed in an industrial establishment shall go on strike in breach of contract and during the period in which a settlement is in operation, in respect of any of the matters covered by such a settlement. The prohibition against a workmen going on strike thus envisages two conditions ; (a) that it is in breach of a contract and (b) that it is during the period in which a settlement is in operation and is in respect of any of the matters covered by such settlement. The said settlement was a contract between the company and the association representing the workmen and it was in operation on 11th May, 1966. But was it in respect of a matter covered by the settlement ? Under section 24 a strike is illegal if it is commenced in contravention of section 23. Section 26 inter alia provides that any workman who commences, continues or otherwise acts in furtherance of a strike which is illegal under the Act shall be punished with imprisonment for a term extending to one month or with fine which may extend to Rs. 50 or with both. Section 27 provides punishment of a person who instigates or incites others to take part in or otherwise acts in furtherance of an illegal strike. The strike envisaged by these two sections is clearly the one which is illegal under section 24 read with section 23. A strike in breach of a contract during the operation of a settlement and in respect of a matter covered by that settlement falls under section 23 (c). But whereas section 26 punishes a workman for going on an illegal strike or for any act in furtherance of such a strike, section 29 lays down the penalty for a person, not necessarily a workman who commits breach of a term of a settlement which is binding under the Act. It is, therefore, an offence for any person on whom a settlement is binding under the Act to commit a breach thereof and the Legislature has viewed it to be a more serious offence, for, it has a higher punishment of imprisonment extending to six months than the punishment for commencing, etc., an illegal strike under section 26. Thus, commencing a strike or acting in furtherance of it in breach of a settlement binding on the person who so commences it or acts in its furtherance is an offence punishable under section 29.

It is clear that there is a distinction between a strike envisaged by section 23 (c) in respect of a matter covered by a settlement and a strike in breach of a settlement envisaged by section 29. That position was conceded by Mr. Gokhale for the management. But his argument was that the strike in question was, firstly, in respect of a matter covered by the said settlement, namely, its prohibition without notice while that settlement was in force and secondly that it was in breach of that settlement. That settlement was in force and secondly that it was in breach of that settlement. This contention and consequently, it was illegal both under section 24 and section 29. This contention does not seem correct, firstly, because though an agreement not to resort to a strike without notice would be the subject matter of a settlement a strike in contravention of such an agreement is not in respect of any of the matters covered by such settlement. Secondly, such a construction would mean as if Parliament intended to provide two different penalties, one under a section 26 and the other under section 29, for the very same offence, one higher than the other, an intention difficult to attribute. The strike was in the matter of the suspension of the said Shency pending a domestic enquiry against him, a matter which obviously was not one of the matters covered by the said settlement. It was, therefore, not a strike illegal under section 24 read with section 23 (c). However, the strike was in contravention of clause 5 of the said settlement and that settlement being binding on the workmen concerned and in operation at the time was punishable under section 29, and, therefore, illegal under that section.

The question whether a strike in contravention of a similar clause in a settlement was illegal arose in *The Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co., Ltd. v. C.B. Mitter and another*¹. As in clause 5 of the settlement before us, the settlement there also provided that "in no case" would the parties thereto resort to direct action such as lockouts, strikes, go-slow and other direct action without four days' notice. The strike in question was commenced in respect of a demand by a workman for a pair of gum-boots, a demand not covered by the settlement. It was common ground that the strike would not fall within the ambit of section 24 but the controversy was whether it was otherwise illegal, the workmen's contention being that it was not, as the said clause against a strike without notice applied only to one declared for enforcing one or the other demands which formed the subject matter of the settlement and since the strike arose out of a matter not covered by the settlement, that clause was inapplicable. This Court negatived the contention and held that the words "in no case" in that clause meant a strike for whatever reason and though it was conceded that it was not illegal under section 24, it was nevertheless held to be illegal not because it was in respect of a matter covered by the said settlement but because it was in contravention of the settlement which was binding on the concerned workmen which meant that the Court held the strike to be illegal under section 29. In our view the decision in the present case must be the same. The strike was illegal not under section 24 but because it was in contravention of the settlement binding on the workmen concerned. Consequently, standing order 22 would apply and participating in or inciting others to join such a strike would amount to misconduct for which the management were entitled to take disciplinary action.

But against that position, the argument was that the agreement dated 11th May, 1966, under which the workmen called off the strike also provided that no disciplinary action would be taken against any workmen in respect of the strike on that day and that therefore the proceedings taken against the three workmen in violation of that agreement amounted to unfair labour practice. The agreement was oral. According to Bernard, Secretary of the association, the agreement was that (a) the charges and the suspension order passed against the said Shenoy should be withdrawn (b) the company should pay the wages for the 3½ hours period of the strike provided the workmen made good the loss of production during that period, and (c) the management would take no action against any one for going on strike. The evidence of Martin, the company's technical director, on the other hand, was that the company agreed only not to punish the said Shenoy and to consider paying wages for the hours of the strike. The Labour Court on this evidence held that the association failed to prove that the management had agreed not to take action against any of the workmen in connection with the strike though it may be that they might have agreed not to victimise any workman for participating in the strike. In fact, the management did not impose any penalty against any workman for joining the strike, not even against the three concerned workmen. This finding being purely one of fact and the Labour Court having given cogent reasons for it we would not interfere with it without the utmost reluctance. We have been taken through the evidence and the correspondence between the parties but we fail to see any error on the part of the Labour Court in reaching that finding.

The next contention was that the orders of dismissal were bad as they took into account the charge of intimidation of the company's officers although the enquiry officer had found that charge was not proved. The chargesheets, exs. M/4-A M/5-A and M 6/A against the three workmen alleged in express terms disorderly behaviour and intimidation. The report of the enquiry officer against the said Vasudevan clearly stated that the enquiry officer accepted the evidence of the management's witnesses and that on that evidence all the charges against him stood proved. While summarising those charges, he, no doubt, did not in so many words use the expression "intimidation". But the evidence which he, as aforesaid accepted, was that Vasudevan along with other workmen entered the G. 2 department at about 3 P. M. on that day and thumping his hand on the table of the said Lakshman Rao threatened that officer in the following words: "now I am in the forefront of the crowd. You cannot do anything. You ask your people to come out and you also come-out. Otherwise you can see what we can do for you now". The said Lakshman Rao had also deposed that he was surrounded by the workers who started pushing and pulling him. The evidence of other officers was that as the crowd which forced its way into this department got unruly they were also forced to leave their places of work. The evidence against Prabakar was that he too was in the forefront of that crowd which squeezed Lakshman Rao and some members thereof inflicted kicks on him. Similarly, there was the evidence of one Raja, the assistant personnel officer, and others that Sandhyavoo was one of those in the forefront of that crowd. According to Raja, Sandhyavoo tried to lift him from his seat with a view to force him to leave his table and finding that the crowd had become restive he left his place. Acceptance of this evidence by the enquiry officer must necessarily mean acceptance of the version of these officers that they were intimidated by the crowd which forced its way into their department led by these three workmen. Though the enquiry officer has not, in so many words, used the expression intimidation his finding of disorderly behaviour must be held to include acts of intimidation.

Lastly, were the orders of dismissal against the three workmen acts of victimisation on the part of the management when admittedly a large number of workmen had staged the strike and also incited others to join that strike? The orders against the three workmen being identical in terms we take the order passed against Vasedevan as a specimen. That order sets out four acts of misconduct by him; (1) striking or stopping work, (2) inciting, (3) riotous and disorderly behaviour and (4) loitering about in the company's premises. Though each one of these acts, according to the order, was misconduct punishable with dismissal, the order states that so far as acts 1 and 4 were concerned, the management did not wish to take a serious view of them as a large number of "misguided" workmen had stopped work and left their places of work without permission. The management, therefore, took action only in respect of acts falling under clauses 3 and 13 of standing order 22 evidently for the reason that they considered incitement, intimidation and riotous and disorderly behaviour as "very grave in nature." We do not think that in taking this view the management discriminated against the three workmen concerned as against the rest or that they dismissed them with the object of victimising. The evidence in the enquiry clearly disclosed that when the crowd forced its way into the G. 2 department it was led by these three workmen, all of whom were in the forefront thereof and two of them had defiantly forced the officers to leave their tables. One of them had threatened as to what he and the others who were behind him in that crowd could do to him if he did not comply and the other had tried even to lift another officer from his chair to compel him to leave his place of work. In these circumstances the management cannot be blamed if they took a serious view of these acts of the three workmen concerned, who had taken up their position in the forefront of that crowd, a position indicative of their having led that crowd into that department and having acted as its leaders. An act of discrimination can only occur if amongst those equally situated an unequal treatment is meted out to one or more of them. Having been found to be the leaders of the crowd, action taken against them cannot on any principle be regarded as discriminatory or unequal. The decision in *Burn and Co. Ltd. v. Workmen*¹, relied on by Mr. Ramamurthi has no bearing on the facts of this case and cannot assist him. Once a misconduct graver than that of the rest was found proved against these three workmen and for which the punishment is dismissal, victimisation cannot legitimately be attributed to the management. It is relevant in this connection to remember that so far as their participation in the strike and loitering about were concerned, no action was taken against these three workmen on the ground that those acts were common with those of the rest of the workmen. In view of these facts it is not understandable how the impugned orders of dismissal could be characterised as acts of victimisation. It is also not possible to say that the finding of incitement and disorderly behaviour of these three workmen was perverse or such as no reasonable body or person could come to on the evidence on record on the ground only that the others also were guilty of those acts. For, there would be nothing wrong if those who misled or misguided other workmen were selected for disciplinary action and not the victims of their persuasion, who in following their precept did similar acts.

In our judgment the orders of dismissal, based on the findings in the domestic enquiry which did not suffer from any infirmity, could not be successfully impeached and therefore, the Labour Court was right in upholding them. The appeal fails and is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—J. C. SHAH, Acting Chief Justice, V. RAMASWAMI AND A. N. GROVER, JJ.

Commissioner of Wealth-Tax, West Bengal II

... Appellant*

v.

Tungabhadra Industries Ltd., Calcutta

... Respondent.

Wealth-tax Act (XXVI of 1957), sections 7 (2) (a) and 27 (6)—Wealth-tax—Net Wealth—Business assets—Valuation—Global valuation—Written down value or balance-sheet value—Value shown by assessee in the balance-sheet, if inflated—Onus of proof on assessee—Balance-sheet value to be adopted in the absence of such proof.

Reference—Judgment of Supreme Court or High Court—Duty of Tribunal to pass orders in conformity with the judgment.

In computing the net wealth of the assessee the Officer proceeded under section 7 (2) (a) of the Act and included the full value of the fixed assets as shown by the assessee in the balance-sheet without any adjustment, after rejecting the contention that the fixed assets should be assessed at their written down value as computed for the purposes of the income-tax. But the Tribunal in appeal held that the written down value may be adopted as the value. The High Court in reference also upheld the view. The Revenue appealed.

Held, that the appeal has to be remanded to the Tribunal.

Under section 7 (2) (a) of the Act the Officer may determine the net value of the assets of the business as a whole, having regard to the balance-sheet of such business as on the valuation date and make such adjustments therein as the circumstances of the case may require. The power conferred upon the Officer to make adjustments as the circumstances may require is also for the purpose of arriving at the true value of the assets of the business.

It is open to the assessee in any particular case to establish after producing relevant materials that the value given of the fixed assets in the balance-sheet is artificially inflated. It is also open to the assessee to establish by acceptable reasons that the written down value of any particular asset represents the proper value of the asset on the relevant valuation date. The onus of proof is on the assessee who must produce reliable material to show that the written down value of the assets and not the balance-sheet value is the true value. In the absence of any such material, the Officer would be justified in a normal case in taking the value given by the assessee itself in its balance-sheet as the real value of the assets for the purposes of the Act.

Section 27 (6) of the Act requires the Tribunal on receiving a copy of the judgment of the Supreme Court or the High Court as the case may be, to pass such orders as are necessary to dispose of the case conformably to such judgment. The scope of the hearing must of course depend upon the nature of the order passed by the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court agrees with the view of the Tribunal the appeal may be disposed of by a formal order. But if the Supreme Court disagrees with the Tribunal on a question of law, the Tribunal must modify its order in the light of the order of the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court has held that the judgment of the Tribunal is vitiated because it is based on no evidence or because the judgment proceeds upon a misconception of the statute, the Tribunal would be under a duty to dispose of the case conformably with the opinion of the Supreme Court and on the merits of the dispute and re-hear the appeal. In all cases, however, opportunity must be afforded to the parties of being heard.

Ramaswami, J.—This appeal is brought by certificate granted under section 29 (1) of the Wealth-tax Act, 1957 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) against the judgment of the Calcutta High Court dated 29th January, 1966 in Wealth-tax Matter No. 372 of 1961.

The respondent is a company which is assessed to wealth-tax for the assessment years 1957-58, 1958-59 and 1959-60. In computing the net wealth of the respondent on the respective valuation dates the Wealth-tax Officer proceeded under section 7 (2) (a) of the Act and included the full value of the fixed assets as shown by the respondent in the respective balance-sheets without any adjustment, after rejecting its contention that the fixed assets should be assessed at their written down value as computed for the purposes of income-tax. In the assessment order for 1957-58 the Wealth-tax Officer gave his reasons as follows :—

“The assessee claimed that since the full amount of depreciation which was admissible under the Income-tax Act was not provided in the balance-sheet the amount of depreciation not provided for earlier should now be deducted from the value of the assets in order to arrive at the net wealth. This contention can hardly be accepted. The depreciation allowable under the Income-tax Act does not determine the market value of the assets. The object of allowing depreciation in the income-tax assessment is quite different. For the purpose of the Wealth-tax assessment the value of the assets as estimated by the assessee itself in its balance-sheet has been accepted.”

Similarly in his assessment order for 1958-59 the Wealth-tax Officer stated as follows :—

“Excluding the value of land, the total value of the fixed assets as per balance-sheet amounts to Rs. 60,53,811 whereas the assessee has shown in its return the value of the same at Rs. 7,69,435. These values have been shown by the assessee on the basis of income-tax written down value and not on the basis of the balance-sheet values as required under the global system of valuation. It is common knowledge that the values of imported machinery has increased considerably during the last few years and, on the valuation date, I do not think that their value should be less than that provided for in the balance-sheet.”

On appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner confirmed the valuation of the fixed assets. On further appeal the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal held that it would be fair in the circumstances of the case to adopt the written down value of the assets as value thereof for all the years under appeal. In the course of its order the Appellate Tribunal said :

“In income-tax assessment depreciation is calculated upon the original cost in a scientific and systematic manner with due regard to the nature of the asset. Therefore, the written down value as determined in the income-tax assessment may be taken as the fair index of the net value of the business assets in most cases. It cannot however be laid down as an inflexible rule of law that in every case the written down value must be taken to be the net value of the business assets. If that were so, the Legislature would have said so in clear terms instead of indulging in the circumlocution in section 7 (2) (a). In this particular case, it appears, the assessee did not make any reserve for depreciation and the assets are old dating back from the inception of the business long ago. In these circumstances, in our opinion, it would be fair to adopt the written down value of the assets as the value thereof for all the years under appeal.”

At the instance of the Commissioner of Income-tax, the Appellate Tribunal stated a case to the High Court under section 27 (1) of the Act on the following question of law :

“Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, for the purpose of determining the net value of the assets of the assessee under section 7 (2) of the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, the Tribunal was right in directing that the written down value of the fixed assets of the assessee should be adopted as the value thereof, instead of their balance-sheet value ?”

By its judgment dated 29th January, 1965 the High Court answered the question in the affirmative and in favour of the respondent.

Section 7 of the Act stood as follows at the material time :

"(1) The value of any asset, other than cash, for the purposes of this Act, shall be estimated to be price which in the opinion of the Wealth-tax Officer it would fetch if sold in the open market on the valuation date.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1),—

(a) where the assessee is carrying on a business for which accounts are maintained by him regularly, the Wealth-tax Officer may, instead of determining separately the value of each asset held by the assessee in such business, determine the net value of the assets of the business as a whole having regard to the balance-sheet of such business as on the valuation date and making such adjustments therein as the circumstances of the case may require.

In *Kesoram Industries & Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Commissioner of Wealth-tax, (Central) Calcutta*¹, the appellant-company had shown in its balance-sheet for the period ending 31st March, 1957, the appreciated value on revaluation of its assets, after making certain adjustments, at Rs. 2,60,52,357 and had introduced in the capital reserve surplus a corresponding balancing figure of Rs. 1,45,87,000 representing the increase in the value of the assets upon re-valuation. For the purposes of wealth-tax, the officer took the sum of Rs. 2,60,52,357 as the value of the assets, whereas the company contended that an adjustment ought to be made in view of the increase in the value shown in the balance-sheet on revaluation. It was held by this Court that as no one could know better the value of the assets than the assessee himself, the Wealth-tax Officer was justified in accepting the value of the assets at the figure shown by the appellant-company itself. It was open to the appellant-company to convince the authorities that that figure was inflated for acceptable reasons; but it did not make any such attempt. It was also open to the Wealth-tax Officer to reject the figure given by the appellant-company and to adopt another figure if he was, for sufficient reasons, satisfied that the figure given by the appellant was wrong.

It is argued on behalf of the appellant in the present case that the High Court was not right in holding that the principle laid down by this Court in *Kesoram Industries*¹ case is not applicable. In our opinion there is justification for this argument. Under sub-section (1) of section 7 of the Act the Wealth-tax Officer is authorised to estimate for the purpose of determining the value of any asset, the price which it would fetch, if sold in the open market on the valuation date. But this rule in the case of a running business may often be inconvenient and may not yield a true estimate of the net value of the total assets of the business. The Legislature has, therefore, provided in sub-section (2) (a) that where the assessee is carrying on business for which accounts are maintained by him regularly, the Wealth-tax Officer may determine the net value of the assets of the business as a whole, having regard to the balance-sheet of such business as on the valuation date and make such adjustments therein as the circumstances of the case may require. The power conferred upon the tax officer to make adjustments as the circumstances of the case may require is also for the purpose of arriving at the true value of the assets of the business. It is of course open to the assessee in any particular case to establish after producing relevant materials that the value given of the fixed assets in the balance-sheet is artificially inflated. It is also open to the assessee to establish by acceptable reasons that the written down value of any particular asset represents the proper value of the asset on the relevant valuation date. In the absence of any material produced by the assessee to demonstrate that the written down value is the real value, the Wealth-tax Officer would be justified in a normal case in taking the value given by the assessee itself to its fixed assets in its balance-sheet for the relevant year as the real value of the assets for the purposes of the wealth-tax. It is a question of fact in each case as to whether the depreciation has to be taken into account in ascertaining the true value of the assets. The onus of proof is on the assessee who must produce reliable material to show that the written down value of the assets and not the balance-sheet value is the true value. If, therefore, the assessee merely claims that the written down value of the assets should be adopted but fails to produce any material to show that the written down value is the true value, the Wealth-tax Officer is justified in rejecting the claims and adopting the values shown by the assessee himself in his balancesheet as the true value of his assets. In our opinion the High Court should have based its decision on the principle of *Kesoram Industries case*¹ and the question of law should be answered in the manner stated by us in this judgment.

But it is necessary to give certain effective directions in this case. Section 27 (6), of the Act requires the Tribunal on receiving a copy of the judgment of the Supreme Court or the High Court as the case may be to pass such orders as are necessary to dispose of the case conformably to such judgment. This clearly imposes an obligation upon the Tribunal to dispose of the appeal in the light and conformably with the judgment of the Supreme Court. Before the Tribunal passes an order disposing of the appeal there would normally be a hearing. The scope of the hearing must of course depend upon the nature of the order passed by the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court agrees with the view of the Tribunal the appeal may be disposed of by a formal order. But if the Supreme Court disagrees with the Tribunal on a question of law, the Tribunal must modify its order in the light of the order of the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court has held that the judgment of the Tribunal is vitiated because it is based on no evidence or because the judgment proceeds upon a misconstruction of the statute, the Tribunal would be under a duty to dispose of the case conformably with the opinion of the Supreme Court and on the merits of the dispute and re-hear the appeal. In all cases, however, opportunity must be afforded to the parties of being heard. In *Income-tax Appellate Tribunal, Bombay v. S. C. Cambatta & Co., Ltd.*², the Bombay High Court has explained the procedure followed in the disposal of an appeal conformably to the judgment of the High Court. Chagla, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court observed :

“when a reference is made to the High Court either under section 66 (1) or section 66 (2) the decision of the Appellate Tribunal cannot be looked upon as final ; in other words, the appeal is not finally disposed of. It is only when the High Court deciding the case, exercises its advisory jurisdiction, and gives directions to the Tribunal on questions of law, and the Tribunal reconsiders the matter and decides it, that the appeal is finally disposed of.it is clear that what the Appellate Tribunal is doing after the High Court has heard the case is to exercise its appellate powers under section 33. The shape that the appeal would ultimately take and the decision that the Appellate Tribunal would ultimately give would entirely depend upon the view taken by the High Court.”

This passage was quoted with approval by this Court in Esthuri Aswathiah v. Commissioner of Income-tax.³ In the present case, therefore, the answer we have furnished to the question in the reference means that the Appellate Tribunal must now, in conformity with the judgment of this Court, act under section 27 (6) of the Act, that is to say, dispose of the case after rehearing the respondent-company and the Commissioner in the light of the evidence and according to law.

There will be no order as to costs.

PRESENT:—SHAH, Acting Chief Justice, V. RAMASWAMI AND GROVER, JJ.

Commissioner of Income-tax, West Bengal-I

v.

India Discount Co., Ltd.

.. Respondent.

Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), sections 10, 12 —Business income or income from other sources—Shares and arrears of dividend—Assessee, dealer in shares—Purchase of shares—Contract to purchase shares and arrears of dividend—Consideration paid for shares and arrears of dividend—Arrears dividend—Receipt by assessee—Not income—Receipt not otherwise income—Not to constitute income by erroneous crediting into profit and loss account.

Company—Shares—Purchase of—Purchaser's right to arrear dividend.

The assessee-company dealing in shares and securities, purchased shares of a company in 1955 under a contract which provided that the registered shareholders should sell the shares to the assessee with arrears of dividends relating to the period 1936-45. The assessee first credited the arrears of dividend to the profit and loss appropriation account and thereafter transferred the same to a reserve fund in the relevant accounting year. No adjustment was made in the share purchase account on account of the receipt of the dividend. The value of the shares which represented the stock-in-trade of the assessee remained the same both in the opening and the closing stocks. The department and the Tribunal held that the dividend was income and assessable. But the High Court in reference held that no part of the arrear dividend was income. The department appealed.

Held that, the consideration paid by the assessee was given not only for the shares but also for share dividends. This is capital purchase by the assessee of the shares together with arrear dividends due on the shares for the years 1936 to 1945. The arrear dividend would not constitute income liable to be taxed either as profit under section 10 of the Act or as dividend under section 12 of the Act.

Where a company declares dividend the same can only be paid to the person who is then the registered holder. A purchaser of shares becomes entitled to all dividends declared since his purchase but not before. If the purchase is made on the eve of declaration of dividends but the purchaser does not get his name mutated in the records of the company in time to have dividend warrant issued in his own name he is entitled to call upon his vendor to make over the dividend to him if and when received. It is well settled that after a sale of the shares and as long as the purchaser does not get his name registered, the vendor is for certain purposes considered a trustee for the purchaser of the rights attaching to the shares or accruing thereon, including the voting rights.

It is well established that a receipt which in law cannot be regarded as income cannot become so merely because the assessee erroneously credited it to the profit and loss account.

On facts: since the arrear dividends are not claimable by the assessee by virtue the right as purchaser they could not become the income of the assessee. They were the income of the vendor. Where the assessee purchased not only the share scripts but also the arrear dividends, the arrear dividends would not constitute income in the hands of the assessee.

S. Mitra, Senior Advocate (P. K. Mukherjee, Advocate with him), for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ramaswami, J.—The respondent is a private limited company (hereinafter referred to as the assessee). The appeal relates to the assessment year 1956-57 for which the previous year is the year ending 30th September, 1955. The business of the assessee was to deal with shares and securities. On 30th September, 1954 the assessee purchased 11,900 shares of Kedarnath Jute Manufacturing Co., Ltd., in two lots, one at the rate of Rs. 9-8-0 per share and the other at Rs. 9-4-0 per share from one Beharilal Nathani, Share broker, for a total consideration of Rs. 1,12,575. When the assessee purchased the said shares a large amount of dividends was in arrear as the previous owners had not claimed the dividends declared between 1936 and 1945, although a large part of the dividend, on the said shares in respect of the years 1945 to 1954 had been collected by the previous owners of the said shares. A letter addressed by Beharilal Nathani to the assessee bearing the date 30th September, 1954 goes to show that the shares had been "sold with arrear dividends". It is admitted that the dividends which had been declared between the years 1936 and 1945 and were received by the assessee during the accounting period amounted to Rs. 43,925. The assessee first credited this sum to the profit and loss appropriation account and thereafter transferred the same to a reserve fund in the accounting year ending 30th September, 1955. No adjustment was made in the share purchase account on account of the receipt of dividend. The value of the shares which represented the stock-in-trade of the assessee remained the same both in the opening and the closing stocks. Before the Income-tax Officer it was contended on behalf of the assessee that as the arrear dividends pertained to the years 1936 to 1945, the arrear dividend received by the assessee was not in the nature of income liable to income-tax as it was merely realisation of capital. The Income-tax Officer rejected the contention of the assessee and treated the amount of arrear dividend as the business income of the assessee liable to tax. On appeal by the assessee the Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax examined the question whether the amount of Rs. 43,925 should be treated as dividend and should, therefore, be assessed under section 12 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) or whether it should be treated as profits and gains of business arising to the assessee and taxed under section 10 of the Act. He, however, held that the amount could not be regarded as "dividend" as the assessee was not the registered shareholder in the years for which the arrear dividends were declared. But he held that since the shares were purchased by the assessee with the knowledge that it would be entitled to receive the arrear dividends which represented profits arising on the acquisition of such shares, the assessee could be deemed to have entered into a scheme of profit-making, an adventure in the nature of trade. The assessee brought a second appeal to the Appellate Tribunal but the appeal was dismissed. The Appellate Tribunal confirmed the findings by the Income-tax authorities and held that the assessee acquired the shares on which the arrear dividends were received in the course of its share-dealing business and that the sum of Rs. 43,925 so received by the assessee formed an integral part of its income arising from business which was liable to tax. At the instance of the assessee the Appellate Tribunal stated a case to the High Court on the following question of law:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case the sum of Rs. 43,925 received by the assessee represented business income arising under section 10 from an adventure in the nature of trade or it was a dividend within the meaning of section 12 of the Income-tax Act."

After looking into the statement of case and also the application of the assessee under section 66 (1) of the Act the High Court held that the question which the Tribunal had referred did not correctly and accurately describe the stand and contention taken by the assessee throughout which was that no part of the arrear dividend received by the assessee was income at all liable to tax. The High Court thereafter addressed itself to the real issue between the parties and ultimately held that the amount of Rs. 43,925 was not liable to tax. This appeal is brought on behalf of the Commissioner of Income-tax against the judgment of the High Court dated 6th January, 1965, by a certificate granted under section 66-A (2) of the Act.

It is necessary that the question referred to by the High Court should be reframed in the following manner in order to bring out the real point in controversy between the parties :

“ Whether in the facts and circumstances of the case the assessee had purchased the arrears of dividend ? If so, whether the said sum of Rs. 43,925 could at all be assessed either as dividend or as profit.”

It is manifest that dividends declared by Kedarnath Jute Manufacturing Co., between the years 1936 and 1945, were the property of the persons whose names stood on the share register on the relevant dates. When a company declares dividend the same can only be paid to the person who is then the registered holder. A purchaser of shares becomes entitled to all dividends declared since his purchase but not before. If the purchase is made on the eve of declaration of dividend, but the purchaser does not get his name mutated in the records of the company in time to have the dividend-warrant issued in his own name he is entitled to call upon his vendor to make over the dividend to him if and when received. It is well settled that after a sale of the shares and so long as the purchaser does not get his name registered, the vendor is for certain purposes considered a trustee for the purchaser of the rights attaching to the shares or accruing thereon, including the voting rights. In the present case there was a contract between the assessee and the registered shareholders to sell the shares to the assessee with arrear dividends. In other words the assessee entered into the contract with the registered shareholders not only to purchase share scrips but the dividends which had been declared but not collected by him or paid over to shareholders. As the dividends had been declared long ago there was no uncertainty as to the exact amount receivable in respect of them. It is, therefore, clear that both the purchaser and the vendor knew exactly what sum of money would come to the vendor by way of such dividend. In other words the purchase consideration included the amount of the arrear dividends and as the dividends had been declared long ago there was no uncertainty as to the exact amount receivable in respect of them. The existence of a contract binding the vendors to make over to the purchaser the arrear dividends clearly implied that the price paid by the purchaser was not only for the value of the share scrips but also for the sum of Rs. 43,925 which was going to be realised in the form of arrear dividends by the purchaser. The High Court held upon an examination of the evidence that such an arrangement implied that the value of Rs. 9-8-0 and Rs. 9-4-0 per share as settled into the broker's bills was not the real value of the share scrips alone but also included the element of the arrear dividends agreed to be receivable by the purchaser. The legal position, therefore, is that the arrear dividends were not claimable by the purchaser by virtue of his right as such purchaser and could not become his income from the shares. He was to get the same because the vendor had contracted to pass the arrear dividends on to him. They were the income of the vendors, i.e., the registered holders but they could not become the income of the purchaser. In fact the assessee had purchased the amount of arrear dividends for a price which was included in the total consideration of Rs. 1,12,575. What the assessee acquired in the form of share scrip represented its stock-in-trade, which consisted of the shares and the dividends potential which had to be realised. In this state of facts it is manifest that the assessee paid the amount of Rs. 1,12,575 not only for the share scrips but also for the arrear dividends which was inextricably connected with the purchase of the share scrips. In our opinion the High Court rightly held that the amount of Rs. 43,925 was not income which could be assessed in the hands of the assessee.

It was said that the assessee had itself credited the amount of Rs. 43,925 to the profit and loss appropriation account and thereafter transferred the same to a reserve fund in the accounting year ending 30th September, 1966. No adjustment was made in the share purchase account on account of the receipt of dividend. But it is well established that a receipt which in law cannot be regarded as income cannot become so merely because the assessee erroneously credited it to the profit and loss account. (See *Commissioner of Income-tax Bombay City-I v. M/s. Shoorji Vallabhadas and Co*¹). The assessee's case had all along been that the amount of arrear dividends received could not be treated as income of the assessee liable to tax for the assessment year 1956-57. As we have already shown the consideration paid by the assessee was given not only for the shares but also for share dividends amounting to Rs. 43,925 and the amount of Rs. 1,12,575 was paid not only for the share scrips but also for the arrears dividends. In other words there was capital purchase by the assessee of the shares together with arrear dividends due on the shares for the years 1936 to 1945. It is therefore not possible to treat the payment of Rs. 43,925 as income liable to tax either as profit under section 10 of the Act or as dividend under section 12 of the Act.

For the reasons expressed we hold that there is no merit in this appeal. It is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

V.S. THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT:—J. C. SHAH, Acting Chief Justice, V. RAMASWAMI AND A. N. GROVER, JJ.

Income-tax Officer, Alleppey

v.

M.C. Ponnose and others

... Respondents.

Income-tax Act, (XLIII of 1961), section 2 (44)—Finance Act, (XIII of 1963), section 4—"Tax Recovery Officer"—Substitution of new definition with retrospective effect—State Government empowered to invest any State Revenue Officer with powers of Tax Recovery Officer by notification—Whether State Government can notify with retrospective effect—Action taken by State Revenue Officer prior to date of notification—Validity.

Section 4 of the Finance Act, 1963, substituted a new definition for the original definition of "Tax Recovery Officer" in section 2 (44) of the Income-tax Act, 1961, and also provided that the new definition shall be and shall be deemed always to have been substituted. The new definition empowered the State Government to authorise by notification any State Revenue Officer to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer. The Government of Kerala issued a notification dated 14th August, 1963, under section 2 (44) (ii) of the Act, authorising various revenue officials including the Taluka Tahsildar to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer. The notification was published in the Kerala Gazette dated 20th August, 1963, and the concluding portion of the notification stated: "This notification shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April, 1962." A Tahsildar effected attachment of shares towards recovery of arrears of income-tax subsequent to first April, 1962, but prior to 14th August, 1963. The High Court, on a petition under Article 226 of the Constitution, held that the notification was invalid and this was affirmed by a division bench in appeal. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Held, that the action taken by the Tahsildar in attaching the shares was unsustainable.

The exercise of the power under sub-clause (ii) of clause (44) of section 2 of the Income-tax Act 1961, is more of an executive than a legislative Act. Therefore the Taluka Tahsildar could not be authorised by the notification to exercise powers of a Tax Recovery Officer with effect from a date prior to the date of the notification.

The only effect of the substitution made by the Finance Act, 1963, was to make the new definition a part of the Income-tax Act, 1961, from the date it was enacted. The legal fiction that the new definition "shall be and shall be deemed always to have been substituted" could not be extended beyond its legitimate field and construed as conferring power for a retrospective authorisation by the State in the absence of any express provision in section 2 (44) of the Act itself.

A. G. Pudissery, Advocate, for Respondents Nos. 7 and 8. (In C. A. No. 943 of 1966.)

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Grover, J.—These two appeals by special leave involve a common question relating to the validity of a notification issued by the Government of Kerala in August, 1963, empowering certain revenue officials including the Taluka Tahsildar to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer under the Income-tax Act, 1961, hereinafter called the Act. The notification was expressly stated to be effective from 1st April 1962—a date prior to the date of the notification.

The facts in one of the appeals (C.A. No. 942 of 1966) may be stated: One Kunchacko of Alleppey allowed the income-tax dues from him to fall into arrears. The Income-tax Officer took steps to recover the arrears through the Tahsildar. Certain shares standing in the name of the assessee were attached by the Tahsildar. The first respondent Ponnose claimed to have obtained a decree for a certain sum against the assessee. He also got the shares standing in the name of the assessee attached in execution proceedings. Ponnose filed a petition under Article 226 of the Constitution in the High Court of Kerala in which he challenged the action taken by the revenue officials including the Tahsildar for getting the shares, which had been attached, sold for satisfaction of the income-tax dues of the assessee.

The learned Single Judge held that the notification empowering the Tahsildar to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer under the Act with retrospective effect was invalid. Consequently the attachments made by the Tahsildar were quashed. This view was affirmed by a division bench in appeal.

The Act came into force on first April 1962. Section 2 (44) defined the expression "Tax Recovery Officer" in the following terms :—

" 'Tax Recovery Officer,' means—

(i) a Collector ;

(ii) an additional Collector or any other officer authorised to exercise the powers of a Collector under any law relating to land revenue for the time being in force in a State ; or

(iii) any Gazetted Officer of the Central or a State Government who may be authorised by the Central Government by notification in the Official Gazette, to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer."

Section 4 of the Finance Act, 1963, substituted a new definition for the original definition of Tax Recovery Officer. It was provided that the new definition "shall be and shall be deemed always to have been substituted." The new definition was as follows :

“Tax Recovery Officer” means—

(i) a Collector or an Additional Collector ;

(ii) any such officer empowered to effect recovery of arrears of land revenue or other public demand under any law relating to land revenue or other public demand for the time being in force in the State as may be authorised by the State Government, by general or special notification in the Official Gazette, to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer.

(iii) any Gazetted Officer of the Central or a State Government who may be authorised by the Central Government, by general or special notification in the Official Gazette, to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer.”

The impugned notification dated 14th August, 1963, which was published in the Kerala Gazette dated 20th August, 1963 referred to the powers conferred by sub-clause (ii) of clause (44) of section 2 of the Act read with sub-rule (2) of rule 7 of the Income-tax (Certificate Proceedings) Rules, 1962 and authorised the various revenue officials mentioned therein including the Taluka Tahsildar to exercise the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer under the Act in respect of the arrears, etc. The concluding portion was, “this notification shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April 1962.” The Tahsildar had effected attachment of the shares subsequent to first April 1962 but prior to 14th August, 1963. In other words on the date on which he had effected attachment he was not a Tax Recovery Officer but he got the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer by virtue of the notification dated 14th August, 1963. The short question for determination, therefore, was and is whether the State Government could invest the Tahsildar with the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer under the aforesaid provisions of the Act with effect from a date prior to the date of the notification, i.e., retroactively or retrospectively.

Now, it is open to a sovereign Legislature to enact laws which have retrospective operation. Even when the Parliament enacts retrospective laws such laws are—in the words of Willies, J. in *Phillips v. Eyre*¹—

“no doubt prima facie of questionable policy, and contrary to the general principle that legislation by which the conduct of mankind is to be regulated ought, when introduced for the first time, to deal with future acts, and ought not to change the character of past transactions carried on upon the faith of the then existing law.”

The Courts will not, therefore, ascribe retrospectivity to new laws affecting rights unless by express words or necessary implication it appears that such was the intention of the Legislature. The Parliament can delegate its legislative power within the recognised limits. Where any rule or regulation is made by any person or authority to whom such powers have been delegated by the Legislature it may or may not be possible to make the same so as to give retrospective operation. It will depend on the language employed in the statutory provision which may in express terms or by necessary implication empower the authority concerned to make a rule or regulation with retrospective effect. But where no such language is to be found it has been held by the Courts that the person or authority exercising subordinate legislative functions cannot make a rule, regulation or bye-law which can operate with retrospective effect ; (see Subba Rao J., in *Dr. Indramani Pyarelal Gupta v. W.R. Nathu & others*²—the majority not having expressed any different opinion on the point; *Modi Food Products Ltd. v. Commissioner of Sales-tax, U.P.*³; *India Sugar Refineries Ltd. v. State of Mysore*⁴ and *General S. Shivdev Singh and another v. The State of Punjab and others*⁵.)

It can hardly be said that the impugned notification promulgates any rule, regulation or bye-law all of which have a definite signification. The exercise of the power under sub-clause (ii) of clause (44) of section 2 of the Act is more of an executive than a legislative act. It becomes, therefore, all the more necessary to consider how such an act which has retrospective operation can be valid in the absence of any power conferred by the aforesaid provision to so perform it as to give it retrospective operation. an industrial dispute had been referred by the Governor to the Labour Commissioner or a person nominated by him with the direction that the award should be submitted not later than 5th April, 1950. The award, however, was made on 13th April, 1950. On 26th April, 1950, the Governor issued a notification extending the time up to 30th April. It was held that in the absence of a provision authorising the State Government to extend from time to time the period within which the Tribunal or the adjudicator could pronounce the decision the State Government had no authority to extend the time and the award was, therefore, one made without jurisdiction and a nullity. This decision is quite apposite and it is difficult to hold in the present case that the Taluka Tahsildar could be authorised by the impugned notification to exercise powers of a Tax Recovery Officer with effect from a date prior to the date of the notification.

It may next be considered whether by saying that the new definition of "Tax Recovery Officer" substituted by section 4 of the Finance Act 1963 "shall be and shall be deemed always to have been substituted" it could be said that by necessary implication or intendment the State Government had been authorised to invest the officers mentioned in the notification with the powers of a Tax Recovery Officer with retrospective effect. The only effect of the substitution made by the Finance Act was to make the new definition a part of the Act from the date it was enacted. The legal fiction could not be extended beyond its legitimate field and the aforesaid words occurring in section 4 of the Finance Act 1963 could not be construed to embody conferment of a power for a retrospective authorisation by the State in the absence of any express provision in section 2 (44) of the Act itself. It may be noticed that in a recent decision of the Constitution Bench of this Court in *B.S. Vadera, etc. v. Union of India & others*¹, it has been observed with reference to rules framed under the proviso to Article 309 of the Constitution that these rules can be made with retrospective operation. This view was, however, expressed owing to the language employed in the proviso to Article 309 that "any rules so made shall have effect subject to the provisions of any such Act." As has been pointed out the clear and unambiguous expressions used in the Constitution, must be given their full and unrestricted meaning unless hedged in by any limitations. Moreover when the language employed in the main part of Article 309 is compared with that of the proviso it becomes clear that the power given to the Legislature for laying down the conditions is identical with the power given to the President or the Governor, as the case may be, in the matter of regulating the recruitment of Government servants and their conditions of service. The Legislature, however, can regulate the recruitment and conditions of service for all times whereas the President and the Governor can do so only till a provision in that behalf is made by or under an Act of the appropriate Legislature. As the Legislature can legislate prospectively as well as retrospectively there can be hardly any justification for saying that the President or the Governor should not be able to make rules in the same manner so as to give them prospective as well as retrospective operation. For these reasons the ambit and content of the rule making power under Article 309 can furnish no analogy or parallel to the present case. The High Court was consequently right in coming to the conclusion that the action taken by the Tahsildar in attaching the shares was unsustainable.

The appeals therefore fail and are dismissed with costs. One hearing fee.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Criminal Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—J. C. SHAH, V. RAMASWAMI AND A. N. GROVER, JJ.

The State of Andhra Pradesh

v.

Yedla Perayya

.. Respondent.

Andhra Pradesh Forest Act (V of 1882) as amended by Act (XI of 1963), sections 43 and 47—Scope—Forest offence—Confiscation of the vehicle made obligatory upon the Magistrate, but no such restriction upon the power of the appellate Court—Power of the appellate Court to set aside the order of confiscation, if in any way restricted—Code of Criminal Procedure (V of 1898), section 520.

Section 43 of the Andhra Pradesh Forest Act (V of 1882) as amended by Act (XI of 1963) made it obligatory upon the Magistrate to confiscate the property or vehicle used in the commission of any forest offence. But, this section does not restrict the power of the appellate Court to pass any appropriate order as may be just regarding disposal of the property. There is no warrant for implying that the power conferred by section 47 of the Act upon the appellate Court is subject to some unexpressed limitation.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order dated the 25th February, 1966 of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in Criminal Revision Case No. 382 of 1964.

P. Ram Reddy, Senior Advocate (G. S. Rama Rao, Advocate, with him), for Appellant.

A. V. Rangam, Miss Sen, Miss A. Vedavalli and Miss Subhashini, Advocates, for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Shah, J.—Motor Lorry No. A.P.P. 4695 belonging to the respondent Yedla Perayya was seized by the Forest Range Officer, Gokavaram, early in the morning of 25th December, 1962, when it was being used without a license for carrying eight Tegisi logs on Rajahmundry-Gokavaram Road. The driver of the motor lorry and another person were tried before the 2nd Additional, 2nd Class Magistrate, Rajahmundry on a complaint by the Forest Range Officer for offence under sections 35 and 36 of the Andhra Pradesh Forest Act and the rules framed thereunder. The two accused admitted that they had committed the offence of illicit transportation of timber, and on their plea of guilty they were convicted. The respondent applied to the Trial Magistrate for an order releasing the motor lorry on the plea that the offence of transportation of timber was committed without his knowledge and that the value of the timber seized was not more than Rs. 50 at the relevant time. The learned Magistrate observed:

“After careful perusal of the deposition of P.W. 1, I find that there is nothing in it to indicate that the petitioner knowingly lent his lorry for the illicit transport of timber on the night of 24th December, 1963. There is also nothing in the case records to show that the petitioner allowed the lorry to illicitly transport the timber on the above date. I accordingly hold that the petitioner cannot be said to have knowingly allowed his lorry to illicitly transport the timber.”

But the learned Magistrate was of the view that by section 43 of the Andhra Pradesh Forest Act, where it was proved that the value of the timber transported exceeded Rs. 50, he was enjoined to direct confiscation of the vehicle in which the forest produce was being transported without a license. In his view the value of eight logs of timber seized from the lorry was Rs. 311 at the market rate in Rajahmundry.

In appeal by the respondent to the Court of Session at Rajahmundry the order of confiscation was set aside and the High Court of Andhra Pradesh confirmed the order of the Court of Session. The State of Andhra Pradesh has appealed to this Court with certificate granted under Article 134 (1) (c) of the Constitution.

The Andhra Pradesh (Andhra Area) Forest Act (V of 1882) provides by section 41 that when there is reason to believe that a forest offence has been committed in respect of any timber or forest produce, such timber or produce together with all tools, ropes, chains, boats, vehicles and cattle used in committing any such offence may be seized by any Forest Officer or Police Officer. Section 43 as amended by Act (XI of 1963) provides:

“Where a person is convicted of any forest offence, the Court sentencing him shall order confiscation to the Government of the timber or the forest produce in respect of which such offence was committed, and also any tool, boat, cattle and vehicle and any other article used in committing such offence:

Provided that it shall be open to such Court not to order confiscation of any tool, boat, cattle, vehicle or any other article used in committing such offence when the value of the timber or the forest produce in respect of which such offence was committed does not exceed fifty rupees.”

It may be observed that before the Forest Act was amended by Act (XI of 1963) the Magistrate was not obliged to direct confiscation of the articles, vehicles, cattle, tools or boats used for committing a forest offence.”

The Trial Magistrate was of the view that after the amendment of the Forest Act by Act (XI of 1963) he had no option and he was bound on conviction of the offender in respect of any forest offence to direct confiscation of the vehicle used in the commission of such offence. Counsel for the respondent contended that if the interpretation put by the Trial Magistrate upon section 43 as amended is correct the enactment imposes an unreasonable restriction upon the fundamental right of the owner of the vehicle declared by Article 19 (1) (c) of the Constitution, and is on that account void. Counsel urged that a statute which imposes upon a person who has himself not committed any offence or infraction of the law liability to forfeit his valuable property must be regarded as unreasonable. It was urged that if a vehicle is stolen and then used for commission of a forest offence, or is borrowed by some person for a legitimate purpose and then used without the consent or knowledge of the owner for committing an offence under the forest Act, or where with a view to involve the owner of the vehicle into a forest offence, forest produce is surreptitiously introduced into the vehicle, and the vehicle is liable to be forfeited, the provision making it obligatory to impose the penalty of forfeiture of the vehicle must be deemed to impose an unreasonable restriction on the owner of the vehicle and is ultra vires on that account. It is not necessary for the purpose of this case to express any opinion on that part of the case. Assuming that the statute which enjoins the Magistrate to confiscate the vehicle used in the commission of the forest offence, even when it is used without the knowledge or consent of the owner, is valid, in our judgment, section 47 of the Act enables the Court of Session and the High Court to make an appropriate order with regard to the vehicle which is just. That section provides:

“Any person claiming to be interested in property seized under section 41, may, within one month from the date of any order passed under section 43, 44 or 45 present an appeal therefrom which may be disposed of in the manner provided by section 419 Code of Criminal Procedure.”

The reference to S. 419 is to the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1872 in force when the Andhra Pradesh Forest Act (V of 1882) was enacted. Section 419 of the Code of 1872 is now substituted by section 520 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and by section 520 power is conferred, inter alia upon the Court of appeal to direct that any order passed under sections 517, 518 or 519 by the Court subordinate thereto be stayed pending consideration by the Court of Appeal, and that Court may modify, alter or annul such order and make any further order that may be just. Section 43 of the Ardhra Pradesh Forest Act does not restrict the power of the appellate Court to pass any appropriate order as may be just regarding disposal of the property. The Court of Session in the present case has on the finding recorded by the Magistrate and confirmed by it passed an order which is essentially a just order, and that has been confirmed by the High Court.

The Legislature had originally conferred a discretion both upon the Magistrate and the Court of Appeal to pass appropriate order with regard to the disposal of property used in the commission of the offence as may be just. The Legislature has thereafter amended section 43 by Act XI of 1963 and made it obligatory upon the Magistrate to confiscate the property or the vehicle used in the commission of such offence. No such restriction has, however, been placed upon the power of the appellate Court and we will not be justified, having regard to the clear expression of the legislative intent, that the power is to be limited in the manner provided by section 43. There is no warrant for implying that the power conferred by section 47 of the Act upon the appellate Court is subject to some unexpressed limitation.

The High Court was, therefore, right in holding that the motor lorry belonging to the respondent, on the finding recorded by the Magistrate, was not liable to be confiscated.

The appeal therefore fails and is dismissed.

Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Rules (1957), Rule 16, sub-rules (1) and (2)—Interpretation—Labour Court—Absence of the party, having notice of the date of hearing—Court, enjoined to proceed with the case under rule 16 (1) passing order in the absence of the party on merits—Application to be filed for setting aside under rule 16 (2)—Rule 16 (2) if applies to an order dismissing the case for default.

The second respondent, along with certain others, had filed an application on 31st December, 1961, claiming identical relief that is claimed in Case No. 217 of 1965. That application was dismissed as not having been prosecuted, on 22nd February, 1964. The second application was filed on 1st January, 1965.

The question that arises for consideration in whether the view of the Labour Court that the second application filed by the second respondent herein is maintainable, is correct.

*Held :—*Sub-rule (1) of rule 16 of the U. P. Industrial Disputes Rules, 1957 refers to a party being absent on the date fixed, or on any other date to which the hearing has been adjourned, and such party having been duly served or having notice of the date of hearing. The said sub-rule (1) indicates as to what is to be done under such circumstances. Rule 12 provides for what the Labour Court or Tribunal should do at the first hearing. Neither the Act nor the rules empower a Tribunal or Labour Court to dismiss an application for default of appearance of a party. Rule 16 (1) is the only provision providing for what is to be done when a party is absent. That provision, which clearly enjoins the Labour Court or Tribunal in the circumstances mentioned therein "to proceed with the case in his absence," either on the date fixed or on any other date to which the hearing may be adjourned, coupled with the further direction "and pass such order as it may deem fit and proper," clearly indicates that the Tribunal or Labour Court should take up the case and decide it on merits and not dismiss it for default. The necessity for filing an application for setting aside an order passed in the case in the absence of a party, as contemplated under sub-rule (2) of rule 16 will only arise when an order on merits affecting the case has been passed in the absence of a party, under sub-rule (1) of rule 16. An order dismissing a case for default or non-prosecution, does not come under sub-rule (1) of rule 16 and to such an order sub-rule (2) has no application.

M. K. Ramamurthi, Mrs. Shayamla Pappu and Vineet Kumar, Advocates, for Respondent No. 2.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Vaidialingam, J.—In this appeal, by Special Leave, the appellant challenges the order of the Allahabad High Court dated 11th May, 1967, dismissing Civil Miscellaneous Writ Petition No. 1647 of 1967.

The facts leading upto the filing of the said writ petition by the appellant under Article 226 of the Constitution may be briefly stated. The appellant is an existing company under the Companies Act, 1956, and has its registered office at Calcutta. The company was and is being managed by Martin Burn Ltd., Secretaries and Treasurers. The company carries on the business of generation, distribution and supply of electricity within its licensed area in the city of Agra and its environs in the State of Uttar Pradesh. On a reference made by the Government of Uttar Pradesh regarding a dispute that had arisen between the electricity undertakings managed by Martin Burn Ltd., of which the appellant was one, and their workmen about the demand of the workmen for supply of uniforms, free of charge, the Chairman, Martin Electricity Supply Company Adjudication Board made an award on 20th February, 1947 in and by which certain types of workmen were directed to be supplied with uniforms. The said award remained operative till 15th April, 1950 on which date it was terminated. Though the award had been terminated, the appellant continued practice of supplying uniforms to its workmen. Subsequently, again, a dispute was raised by the employees of the electricity undertakings managed by Martin Burn Ltd., regarding the supply of uniforms to some categories of workers. The said dispute was referred by the Government of Uttar Pradesh, by order dated 15th March, 1951, for adjudication to the State Industrial Tribunal, Uttar Pradesh, Allahabad. The said Industrial Tribunal passed an award dated 29th November, 1952, holding that the same categories of workmen to whom uniforms had to be supplied as per the award dated 20th February, 1947 were entitled to be supplied with uniforms. Though this award remained in operation only for a period of one year, the appellant continued to supply uniforms till 1953 after which year the supply of uniforms was discontinued. Nevertheless, the appellant again resumed supplying uniforms from May, 1961.

On 31st December, 1961 twenty-three employees of the appellant, including the second respondent herein filed a joint petition before the Labour Court, Meerut, under section 6-H (2) of the Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (hereinafter referred to as the Act), claiming that they were entitled to recover the money equivalent to the cost of uniforms which had not been supplied to them during the period 1954 to 1960. The said petition was numbered as Case No. 1 of 1962. According to these employees, the employer had failed to supply them uniforms which they were entitled to get and in consequence of such failure the workmen had been put to expense by purchase of clothes to be used while rendering service in the company. They claimed that the benefits which they were entitled to get should be computed in terms of money to enable them to recover the cost of uniforms from the appellant. The appellant filed a written statement on 27th January, 1962, disputing the claim of the workmen and denying its liability to either supply uniform or pay the money value of the same.

On 22nd February, 1964, the application filed by the workmen was taken up by the Labour Court for hearing, but as none appeared on behalf of the workmen who were the applicants when the case was called on for hearing, the Labour Court, Meerut, dismissed the application for non-prosecution. The actual order passed by the Labour Court was as follows:

“Case called on for hearing. No one is present on behalf of the applicant, nor any request for adjournment has been received.

The application is dismissed as not having been prosecuted. No order as to costs.”

On or about 1st January, 1965, seven employees of the appellant, including the second respondent herein, filed seven separate applications before the Labour Court, Meerut, again under section 6-H (2) of the Act. The seven applications had been numbered as Case Nos. 217 to 223 of 1965. The application filed by the second respondent was Case No. 217 of 1965. The second respondent, in particular claimed that he was a mains cooly from 13th April, 1950 to 15th September, 1959, and that he was entitled to be supplied uniform by the appellant. As the uniform had not been so supplied, he pleaded that he was entitled to recover a sum of Rs. 330 as cost of the uniforms which the management should have supplied during these years. All the applicants, including the second respondent, had also stated in their respective applications that they had moved before, the Labour Court a similar application, under section 6-H (2) of the Act, but unfortunately that had been dismissed for default on 21st February, 1964 and hence the fresh applications were being filed.

The appellant filed, on or about 7th April, 1965, separate objections denying the claim made by the applicants. We are not, at this stage, concerned with the various pleas taken either by the employees, in support of their claim, or by the appellant, in denial thereof. It is only necessary to state that the appellant pleaded that the fresh applications, filed by the workmen, were not maintainable in view of the fact that identical applications, claiming the same reliefs, had been dismissed on 21st February, 1964 by the Labour Court. If the workmen were aggrieved by the said order, the proper remedy that should have been adopted by them was by taking action under rule 16 (2) of the Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Rules, 1957 (hereinafter referred to as the Rules). Not having adopted the procedure indicated therein the management pleaded that it was no longer open to the workmen to file a second application and the Labour Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the same.

The Labour Court had, by its order dated 27th August, 1965, consolidated all the seven applications. On the basis of the objection raised by the appellant to the maintainability of the applications filed, issue No. 5 was framed in the following terms:—

and this issue was treated as a preliminary issue and arguments heard on the same. By order dated 10th February, 1967, the Labour Court held that the applications filed by the seven workmen, including the second respondent were maintainable. The Labour Court has expressed the view that the order passed on 21st February, 1964 was one dismissing the applications, filed by the workmen, for default and such an order was not contemplated by sub-rule (1) of rule 16 of the rules, and hence the workmen were not bound to take action under sub-rule (2) of rule 16. In consequence the Labour Court held that the applications filed by the workmen were competent and directed the applications to be posted for further hearing.

Though the order had been passed in Case No. 217 of 1965, the Labour Court directed that the finding given on issue No. 5 would govern Cases Nos. 218 to 223 of 1965 also. The appellant challenged this finding of the Labour Court before the High Court of Allahabad in Civil Writ No. 1647 of 1967. A Division Bench of the High Court, by its order dated 11th May, 1967, summarily dismissed the writ petition.

Mr. Gupte, learned Counsel for the appellant and Mr. Ramamurthy, learned Counsel for the second respondent, urged the same contentions that were urged on behalf of their clients before the Labour Court. Therefore the question that arises for consideration is whether the view of the Labour Court that the second application filed by the second respondent herein is maintainable, is correct.

Section 6-H of the Act deals with recovery of money due from an employer. Section 6-H more or less corresponds to section 33-C of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. Sub-section (2) of section 6-H, with which we are concerned, is as follows:

“(2) Where any workman is entitled to receive from the employer any benefit which is capable of being computed in terms of money, the amount at which such benefit should be computed may, subject to any rules that may be made under this Act, be determined by such Labour Court as may be specified in this behalf by the State Government, and the amount so determined may be recovered as provided for in sub-section (1).”

As we have already mentioned the second respondent, along with certain others, had filed an application on 31st December, 1961 claiming identical relief that is now claimed in Case No. 217 of 1965. That application was dismissed as not having been prosecuted on 22nd February, 1964. The second application was filed on 1st January, 1965.

We shall now refer to the relevant rules. Rule 9 empowers a Tribunal or Labour Court to accept, admit or call for evidence at any stage of the proceedings before it and in such manner as it may think fit. Rule 10 relates to the issue of summons for production of any books, papers or other documents as the Labour Court, Tribunal or Arbitrator feels necessary for the purpose of investigation or adjudication. Rule 12 relates to procedure at the first hearing. It states that at the first sitting of a Labour Court or Tribunal, the Presiding Officer shall call upon the parties in such order as he may think fit to state their case. Rule 16 provides for the Labour Court or Tribunal or Arbitrator proceeding ex parte, as follows :

“(1) If, on the date fixed or on any other date to which hearing may be adjourned, any party to the proceedings before the Labour Court or Tribunal or an Arbitrator is absent, though duly served with summons or having the notice of the date of hearing, the Labour Court or Tribunal or the Arbitrator, as the case may be, may proceed with the case in his absence and pass such order as it may deem fit and proper.

(2) The Labour Court, Tribunal or an Arbitrator may set aside the order passed against the party in his absence if within ten days of such order, the party applies in writing for setting aside such order and shows sufficient cause for his absence. The Labour Court, Tribunal or an Arbitrator may require the party to file an affidavit, stating the cause of his absence. As many copies of the application and affidavit, if any, shall be filed by the party concerned as there are persons on the opposite side. Notice of the application shall be given to the opposite parties before setting aside the order.”

Sub-rule (1) deals with the absence of a party on the date fixed, of any other date to which the hearing may be adjourned, though he has been served with summons or he has notice of the date of hearing. Under those circumstances it provides that the Labour Court, Tribunal or Arbitrator, as the case may be “may proceed with the case in his absence and pass such order as it may deem fit and proper.” It is to the setting aside of such an order that may have been passed under sub-rule (1), that the procedure is indicated in sub-rule (2). According to Mr. Gupte, learned Counsel for the appellant, the order passed on 22nd February, 1964, by the Labour Court is one contemplated by sub-rule (1) of rule 16, in which case the provisions of sub-rule (2) are attracted and the second respondent, if he felt aggrieved by that order, should have filed an application under sub-rule (2), within time, to set aside that order.

We are not inclined to accept this contention of Mr. Gupte. As pointed out earlier by us, the order passed on 22nd February, 1964, is one dismissing the application as not having been prosecuted, for default of appearance of the second respondent. We will presently show that the order of 22nd February, 1964 cannot be considered to be one contemplated to have been passed under sub-rule (1) of rule 16. Sub-rule (1) refers to a party being absent on the date fixed, or on any other date to which the hearing has been adjourned, and such party having been duly served or having notice of the date of hearing. The said sub-rule (1) indicates as to what is to be done under such circumstances. We have referred to rule 12 which provides for what the Labour Court or Tribunal should do at the first hearing. Neither the Act nor the rules empower a Tribunal or Labour Court to dismiss an application for default of appearance of a party. Rule 16 (1) is the only provision providing for what is to be done when a party is absent. That provision, which clearly enjoins the Labour Court or Tribunal in the circumstances mentioned therein "to proceed with the case in his absence", either on the date fixed or on any other date to which the hearing may be adjourned, coupled with the further direction "and pass such order as it may deem fit and proper", clearly indicates that the Tribunal or Labour Court should take up the case and decide it on merits and not dismiss it for default. Without attempting to be exhaustive, we shall just give an example. Where a workman, after leading some evidence in support of his claim, absents himself on the next adjourned date with the result that he does not lead further evidence, the Tribunal is bound to proceed with the case on such evidence as has been placed before it. It cannot dismiss the application on the ground of default of appearance of the workman. This will be an instance of "proceeding with the case in the absence of a party" and giving a decision on merits. If such an order is passed by the Tribunal in the absence of one or other of the parties before it, a right is given to such party to apply, under sub-rule (2) for setting aside the order that has been passed in his absence in the case in terms of sub-rule (1). The application must be filed within the period mentioned in sub-rule (2) and the party will have also to satisfy the Tribunal or Labour Court that he had sufficient cause for his absence. The necessity for filing an application for setting aside an order passed in the case in the absence of a party, as contemplated under sub-rule (2) of rule 16 will only arise when an order on merits affecting the case has been passed in the absence of a party, under sub-rule (1) of rule 16. An order dismissing a case for default or non-prosecution, does not come under sub-rule (1) of rule 16 and to such an order sub-rule (2) has no application.

We have already indicated that the order passed on 22nd February, 1964 by the Labour Court cannot be considered to be an order contemplated under sub-rule (1) of rule 16. If that is so, the second respondent was not bound to file an application within the time mentioned in sub-rule (2) for setting aside the order dated 22nd February, 1964. Therefore the fact that a previous application, filed by the second respondent, was dismissed for non-prosecution on 22nd February, 1964 is no bar under rule 16 (2) to the filing of the present application, Case No. 217 of 1965. It follows that the objections raised by the appellant to the maintainability of the application filed by the second respondent have been rightly rejected by the Labour Court and the High Court.

The appeal fails and is dismissed. The appellant will pay the costs of the second respondent.

U.P. Municipalities Act (II of 1916), section 97—Scope—Contract on behalf of the Municipal Board to be in writing and to be signed by the President and by the Executive Officer—List of bids duly signed and resolution sanctioning the auction sale, if in compliance with section 97.

Section 97 of the U.P. Municipalities Act, 1916, inter alia provided that (i) every contract made by or on behalf of a Board whereof the value of the amount exceed Rs. 250 shall be in writing and (ii) "every such contract shall be signed by the President or Vice-President and by the Executive Officer or a Secretary, or" In the public auction the theka, the defendant made the bid of Rs. 53,025 which was accepted. The list of bids at the auction sale held is signed by the defendant, the Chairman and the Executive Officer. This auction was held before the Board and a resolution sanctioning auction to the highest bidder. After the entire proceedings were over, it was duly signed in the original proceedings book by the Executive Officer of the Municipal Board and Chairman. It is not necessary for the purpose of complying with section 97 of the Act that the contract should be contained in one document signed by both the parties.

Appeal by Special Leave from Judgment and the Decree dated the 15th March 1965 of the Allahabad High Court in First Appeal No. 268 of 1953.

G.B. Agarwala, Senior Advocate, (K.P. Gupta, Advocate, with him), for Appellant.

R.K. Garg, D.K. Agrawal and M.V. Goswami, Advocates, for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Sikri, J.—This is an appeal by Special Leave, and while granting it this Court, confined it only to the point arising under section 97 of the U.P. Municipalities Act 1916—hereinafter referred to as the Act.

The facts relevant to the point are as follows: The Municipal Board, Saharanpur respondent before us and hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff—brought a suit for the recovery of Rs. 12,044-0-9 and future interest upto date of realisation from B.C. Mohindra, appellant before us and hereinafter referred to as the defendant. In brief the case of the plaintiff was that there was an auction on 29th March, 1950, of the theka for collecting tahbazari dues of the mandi in Mazahir Gang alias Ganj Jadid Saharanpur, for one year from 1st April, 1950 to 31st March, 1951, subject to the conditions of sale entered in the amended sale proclamation. The defendant bid Rs. 40,000 subject to the confirmation by the Board. The Board did not confirm the auction sale, and on 8th April, 1950, the tahbazari was re-auctioned. The defendant bid Rs. 53,025. At the time of the auction sale a meeting of the Board was also held in which the auction aforesaid was confirmed under Resolution No. 26 dated 8th April, 1950, in the presence of the defendant, and only the condition relating to the payment of auction money was amended to provide for payment in four instalments. The defendant had to deposit 1/4th of the bid on 8th April, 1950. He failed to deposit this instalment on 8th April, 1950, but on 10th April, 1950, he deposited the instalment and took charge of the mandi aforesaid and began to collect tahbazari dues. The defendant was asked to execute and complete an agreement in favour of the plaintiff according to the conditions and the rules but he continued to put off the matter. As the defendant failed to deposit the amount of the second instalment and execute the agreement, the plaintiff cancelled the theka of the defendant and began collecting tahbazari dues through its own staff and re-auctioned the theka on 3rd July, 1950. After taking into account the money received from the re-auction on 3rd July, 1950, and the money deposited by the defendant, according to the plaintiff there was a shortage of Rs. 12,044-0-9.

The defendant did not dispute the fact that an auction was held and that he made the last bid of Rs. 53,025 which was accepted. He also admitted that he had deposited Rs. 13,256-4-0. But he alleged that the plaintiff had committed various breaches of the contract in contravention of the rules, contract and the bye-laws as the result of which the defendant suffered a loss of Rs. 9,685.

The Trial Court framed various issues arising out of the pleadings but no issue was raised regarding non-compliance with section 97 of the Act. It appears that an argument was raised before the Trial Court regarding section 97. The Trial Court observed :

“ On the basis of this decision (A.W.R. 1951 page 560), it was urged on behalf of the defendant that it was necessary in the present case that a written contract should have been obtained by the plaintiff under section 97 of the Municipalities Act..... In a public auction, the various bidders give their bids which may be called offers and the moment the auctioneer knocks the hammer down at a particular bid, that bid is to be taken as accepted between the parties. It is the knock of the hammer which concludes the contract. The list of bidders is the only evidence of the contract showing that out of various offers, the highest bid was accepted. In this particular case, the list of bidders bears the signature of the defendant and of the Chairman of the plaintiff Board, thus reducing the contract into writing vide Exhibit 17.

The contract in this case is therefore, a written contract evidence from paper Exhibit 17.....According to the provision of section 97 of the Municipalities Act, such a contract should have been only in writing and this condition was fulfilled by drawing up the list of bidders and obtaining the signature of the highest bidder in whose favour the auction was concluded on such a list.”

The Trial Court decreed the suit.

The defendant appealed to the High Court, and the High Court (Srivastava and Jagadish Sahai, JJ.) by its order dated 5th October, 1961, remanded the case on two issues :

(1) Whether the agreement relied upon by the plaintiff was in accordance with sections 96 and 97 of the U.P. Municipalities Act of 1916? If not, what is the effect?

(2) Whether section 65 of the Indian Contract Act applied? If so, what compensation, if any, could be recovered by the plaintiff from the defendant on account of any advantage the latter may have received under the agreement?

While passing the order of remand the High Court observed :

“ While hearing arguments in this appeal we discovered that a very important point was apparently missed both by the parties and by the learned Civil Judge. We feel that the case cannot be properly decided without having findings of the learned Civil Judge on that point. The point involves two questions.”

We are in agreement with the contention of the learned Counsel for the plaintiff that there was no justification in remanding the case. The Trial Court had dealt with the question of section 97 of the Act and this apparently escaped the notice of the High Court.

Be that as it may, the Trial Court, in a very careful and reasoned order, dated 24th August, 1962, held that on the facts sections 96 and 97 of the Act had been fully complied with.

The High Court (Jagdish Sahai and Broom, JJ.) came to the conclusion that section 97 of the Act did not apply to the facts of the case. The High Court observed,

“The suit, therefore, is one for the failure to execute the contract deed and to pay the amounts which have become due from him by way of damages. Section 97 of the Act deals with contracts which have been executed. It is for this reason that we have come to the conclusion that the provisions of section 97 of the Act are not attracted to the present case.”

Section 97 of the Act reads as follow :

“Execution of Contracts (1) Every contract made by or on behalf of a Board where of the value of the amount exceeds Rs. 250 shall be in writing ; Provided that unless the Contract has been duly executed in writing, no work including collection of materials in connection with the said contract shall be commenced or undertaken.

(2) Every such contract shall be signed

(a) by the President or a Vice-President and by the Executive Officer or a Secretary, or

(b) by any person or persons empowered under sub-section (2) or (3) of the previous section to sanction the contract if further and in like manner empowered in this behalf by the Board.”

It seems to us that on the facts of the case it is clearly proved that there was a contract in writing within the meaning of proviso to section 97 (1) and the provisions of sub-section (2). We agree with the conclusion of the Trial Court in this respect. The list of bids, Exhibit 17, at the auction sale held on 8th April, 1950, is signed by the defendant the Chairman and the Executive Officer. This auction was held before the Board and Resolution No. 26 dated 8th April, 1950, was passed on that day, which reads as follows :

“Auction of the tahbazari contract of Mandi Mazahar Gunj for the year 1950-51 (Boards Reso. No. 431 dated 30th March, 1950).

“Auction held before the Board. Terms of auction were announced. During the auction, at the request of the bidders, the Board unanimously, passed the following amendment in the terms of auction :—

“One fourth of the auction money will be deposited at the fall of hammer and the remaining amount in three equal instalments at the interval of two months each i.e., 1st instalment today	8-4-50.

2nd instalment on	8-6-50
3rd instalment on	8-8-50
4th instalment on	8-10-50”

“Auction sanctioned to the highest bidder Shri B.C. Mohindra for Rs. 53,025 with effect from 9th April, 1950 to 31st March, 1951. Chairman Finance Committee to please deliver the possession and to decide the disputes, if any.”

The original proceedings book was produced before the Trial Court and it was proved by Ram Swarup, clerk. He proved that after the entire proceedings were over, it was signed before him by Madho Prashad, Executive Officer of the Municipal Board, and Shri Jamshed Ali Khan, the Chairman.

In our opinion the list of bids and the Resolution No. 26 dated 8th April, 1950, Exhibit 18, constituted a contract in writing within the meaning of section 97 of the Act. It was held by this Court in *Union of India v. Rallia Ram*¹, that for the purposes of section 175 (3) of the Government of India Act, 1935, a valid contract could be spelt out of correspondence. It seems to us that similarly it is not necessary for the purpose of complying with section 97 of the Act that the contract should be contained in one document signed by both the parties.

In view of our conclusion it is not necessary to consider what would have been the rights of the plaintiff if there had been no such contract in writing.

In the result the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

The Chief Controller of Imports and Exports and others

Constitution of India (1950), Article 226—Scope—Relief under—Discretionary—Petitioner to exhaust the remedies provided by law with utmost expedition—Delay—Unsatisfactory explanation—Effect.

It is well-settled that the relief under Article 226 is discretionary, and one ground for refusing relief under Article 226 is that the petitioner has filed the petition after delay for which there is no satisfactory explanation. The appellant in this case had claimed a mandamus or a direction to the respondents to issue to the appellant import licence for art silk yarn of the value of Rs. 8,03,530-45. It is well-known that the exchange position of this country and the policy of the Government regarding International Trade varies from year to year and it would be rather odd for the Court to direct that an import licence be granted in the year 1968 in respect of alleged default committed by the Government in 1959 or 1962. In these matters it is essential that persons who are aggrieved by orders of the Government should approach the High Court after exhausting the remedies provided by the law, rule or order with utmost expedition.

Appeal from the Order dated the 26th August, 1964 of the Punjab High Court in Civil Writ No. 498-D of 1964.

M.G. Chagla, Senior Advocate, (Sardar Bahadur, Ajit Prasad Jain, Vishnu B. Saharya, and Miss Youngindra Kaushalani, Advocates, with him), for Appellant.

Dr. V. A. Seyid Muhammad, Senior Advocate (S. P. Nayar, Advocate, with him), for Respondents.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Sikri, J.—The appellant, Durga Prasad, filed a petition under Article 226 of the Constitution against the respondents. The High Court of Punjab, Circuit Bench, Delhi, dismissed the petition in limine. Thereupon the appellant applied for a certificate under Article 133 (1) (a) of the Constitution. The High Court gave this certificate on the ground that the value of the subject-matter directly involved in the petition exceeds Rs. 20,000.

In our opinion this appeal must fail on the ground that the petition under Article 226 of the Constitution was filed after great delay. The relevant facts are as under. The appellant was carrying on business of export and import, and exported goods of the value of Rs. 8,10,325, F.O.B. value Rs. 8,03,530-45, during the period 25th August, 1958 to 29th September, 1958. On 12th November, 1958, the appellant applied for an import licence for art silk yarn of the F.O.B. value of Rs. 8,03,530-45 under the Export Promotion Scheme. The Export Promotion Scheme was discontinued with effect from 6th March, 1959. On 9th October, 1959, import licence of the value of Rs. 3,27,841 only was issued to the appellant by the Joint Chief Controller of Imports and Exports, Bombay. His appeal against this order was rejected by the Joint Chief Controller on 4th. March, 1960. It is alleged by the appellant that he was not given a hearing. The appellant filed a second appeal to the Chief Controller of Imports and Exports, and this was dismissed on 22nd April, 1961. Here again it is alleged that no hearing was given to the appellant. He filed a representation against the order dated 22nd April, 1961, and on that representation a supplementary import licence for import of art silk yarn of the value of Rs. 30,000 was issued to the appellant. This exhausted all the remedies he had under para. 85 of the order relating to the Export Promotion Scheme, but he instead of filing a writ chose to wait. The appellant apparently approached the Minister of International Trade by letter dated 6th April, 1964—this is the letter referred to in the letter of the Private Secretary to the Minister of International Trade—and the Private Secretary, vide his letter dated 16th April, 1964, wrote to him saying that his letter had been passed on to the Chief Controller of Imports and Exports, New Delhi, and if so desired the appellant may see him in the matter. Apparently the Chief Controller invited him and on 22nd June, 1964, he was informed that no further licence would be issued to him. On 24th August, 1964, the appellant filed the petition above-mentioned in the High Court. No explanation has been given in the petition for the delay in filing the petition and it has not been explained what the appellant was doing between 5th March, 1962, when the supplementary licence was issued, and 6th April, 1964.

It is well-settled that the relief under Article 226 is discretionary, and one ground for refusing relief under Article 226 is that the petitioner has filed the petition after delay for which there is no satisfactory explanation.

Gajendragadkar, C.J., speaking for the Constitution Bench, in Smt. Narayani Debi Khaitan v. The State of Bihar,¹ observed :

“It is well-settled that under Article 226, the power of the High Court to issue an appropriate writ is discretionary. There can be no doubt that if a citizen moves the High Court under Article 226 and contends that his fundamental rights have been contravened by any executive action, the High Court would naturally like to give relief to him; but even in such a case, if the petitioner has been guilty of laches, and there are other relevant circumstances which indicate that it would be in appropriate for the High Court to exercise its high prerogative jurisdiction in favour of the petitioner, ends of justice may require that the High Court should refuse to issue a writ. There can be little doubt that if it is shown that a party moving the High Court under Article 226 for a writ is, in substance, claiming a relief which under the law of limitation was barred at the time when the writ petition was filed, the High Court would refuse to grant any relief in its writ jurisdiction. No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to when the High Court should refuse to exercise its jurisdiction in favour of a party who moves it after considerable delay and is otherwise guilty of laches. That is a matter which must be left to the discretion of the High Court and like all matters left to the discretion of the Court, in this matter too discretion must be exercised judiciously and reasonably.”

Relying on the judgment of this Court in *Maharashtra State Road Transport Corporation v. Shri Balwant Regular Motor Service, Amravati*², the learned Counsel for the appellant contends that the delay should not debar him from seeking relief because the respondents have not suffered in any manner because of the delay. In this case Ramaswami, J., speaking for the Court, referred to an earlier decision in *Moon Mills v. Industrial Court*³. In that case Ramaswami, J., speaking for the Court, observed :

1. C. A. No. 140 of 1964 ; Judgment dated 3. (1968) 1 S.C.J. 364 : A.I.R. 1969 S.C. 22nd September, 1964. 1450, 53, 54.
2. (1969) 1 S.C.J. 805. (Since reported)

"It is true that the issue of a writ of certiorari is largely a matter of sound discretion. It is also true that the writ will not be granted if there is such negligence or omission on the part of the applicant to assert his right as, taken in conjunction with the lapse of time and other circumstances, causes prejudice to the adverse party. The principle is to a great extent, though not identical with, similar to the exercise of discretion in the Court of Chancery."

It would be noticed that Ramaswami, J., had first examined the question of delay and came to a finding that in fact there was no delay. Ramaswami, J., observed :

"On behalf of the respondent Mr. B. Sen, however, pointed out that the conduct of the appellant does not entitle it to the grant of a writ, because it has been guilty of acquiescence or delay. It was pointed out that the award of Mr. Bhat was given on 25th April, 1958, but an application to the High Court for grant of a writ was made long after on 16th November, 1959. We do not think there is any substance in this argument, because the second respondent had made an application, dated 19th August, 1958 to the Labour Court for enforcement of the award and the appellant had contested that application by a Written Statement, dated 15th September, 1958. The Labour Court allowed the application on 4th August, 1959 and the appellant had preferred an appeal to the Industrial Court on 31st August, 1959. The decision of the Industrial Court was given on 24th October, 1959 and after the appeal was dismissed the appellant moved the High Court for grant of a writ on 16th November, 1959."

The appellant in this case had claimed a mandamus or a direction to the respondents to issue to the appellant import licence for art silk yarn of the value of Rs. 8,03,530.45. It is well-known that the exchange position of this country and the policy of the Government regarding International Trade varies from year to year and it would be rather odd for this Court to direct that an import licence be granted in the year 1968 in respect of alleged default committed by the Government in 1959 or 1962. In these matters it is essential that persons who are aggrieved by orders of the Government should approach the High Court after exhausting the remedies provided by law, rule or order with utmost expedition.

The learned Counsel for the appellant contends that this matter involved fundamental rights and this Court atleast should not refuse to give relief on the ground of delay. But we are exercising our jurisdiction not under Article 32 but under Article 226, and as observed by Gajendragadkar, C.J., in the passage extracted above, even in the case of alleged breach of fundamental rights the matter must be left to the discretion of the High Court.

In the result the appeal fails. Parties with bear their own costs.

Mysore Village Panchayats and Local Boards Act (X of 1959), section 220 and the Mysore Panchayat Secretaries' Powers and Duties Rules (1961), rule 16—Interpretation—Contravention of section 220 by the members of the Panchayat—Private complaint, if could be entertained.

It would be the panchayat that would be largely interested in taking action against any of its members and employees for the contravention of section 200 of the Mysore Village Panchayats and Local Boards Act, 1959. The scheme of the Act also supports the view that it is the Secretary of the Panchayat and no one else who could file a complaint under rule 16 of the Mysore Panchayat Secretaries, Powers and Duties Rules, 1961.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and Order, dated the 30th March, 1966 of the Mysore High Court in Criminal Revision Petition No. 384 of 1965.

R. B. Datar, Advocate, for Appellants.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Grover, J.—This is an appeal by Special Leave from a judgment of the Mysore High Court in which the only point involved is whether a private complaint could be entertained for the commission of an offence under section 220 of the Mysore Village Panchayats and Local Boards Act, 1959, hereinafter called the "Act". The appellants who were the Vice-Chairman and the Chairman of the Keladi village panchayat were convicted under the aforesaid section and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 50 and Rs. 40 and in default to undergo 7 days and 5 days' simple imprisonment respectively.

A private complaint was filed against the appellants alleging that they gave bids at an auction held at the village panchayat and appellant No. 1 purchased a radio belonging to the panchayat for Rs. 35. Appellant No. 2 also bid at the same auction for the radio. According to section 220 of the Act no member or an employee of a panchayat shall directly or indirectly bid for or acquire interest in any movable or immovable property sold at such sale in connection therewith. If any person contravenes this provision he is to be punished, on conviction, with a fine which may extend to Rs. 500. Under rule 16 of the Mysore Panchayat Secretaries' Powers and Duties Rules, 1961 promulgated under the provisions of the Act, only the Secretary of the Panchayat has the power to file a complaint on behalf of the Panchayat. The High Court was of the view that this rule did not preclude persons other than the Secretary from filing a complaint but it only debarred complaints being made by other on behalf of the Panchayat. Now Rule 16 may be reproduced:

"The Secretary shall have power to file complaints and suits on behalf of the Panchayat and to conduct the proceedings on its behalf under the orders of the Panchayat."

In *K. M. Kanavi v. The State of Mysore*¹, the appellant Kanavi, who was the president of Municipal Borough of Gadag Betgeri had been removed from Presidentship. He refused to hand over the charge of all the papers and property which were in his possession relating to the Borough to the new President in spite of an order made by the Government under section 23-A of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, hereinafter called the "Bombay Act" to that effect. Pursuant to orders made by the Divisional Commissioner and the Deputy Commissioner the new President filed a complaint against Kanavi for an offence punishable under section 23-A (3) of the Bombay Act. The appellant was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 50. A question arose whether the complaint filed by the new President was competent as it was not filed in accordance with the procedure laid down in that Act. Section 200 of the Bombay Act provided that the Standing Committee and subject to the provisions of sub-section (3) the Chief Officer may order proceedings to be taken for the recovery of any penalties and for the punishment of any persons offending against the provisions of the aforesaid Act. This Court was of the opinion that the complaint which had been filed by the new President was for initiating the proceedings for the punishment of Kanavi who had offended against the provisions of sub-section (2) of section 23-A and as the new President was not the Chief Officer and he had not filed the complaint under any direction made by the Standing Committee the complaint could not be entertained. In that case also the High Court had taken the view that section 200 (1) was only an enabling section which gave the power to the Standing Committee and the Chief

1. Crd. A. No. 145 of 1955, dated 18th April, 1968.

Officer to make a direction for taking of proceedings and it could not be held to be exhaustive of the authorities who could make directions for initiation of proceedings. The High Court had taken notice of the fact that there was no provision in that Act forbidding cognizance of offences being taken except on a complaint made under a direction of the Standing Committee or the Chief Officer. This is what was observed by this Court:—

“ We are unable to accept the interpretation put by the High Court on section 200 (1) of the Act. It is true that there is no specific provision in the Act laying down that cognizance of an offence under the Act is not to be taken except on a complaint filed in accordance with a direction made under section 200 (1), but the scheme of the Act and the purpose of this provision in section 200 (1) makes it clear that the Legislature intended that such proceedings should only be instituted in the manner laid down in that sub-section. The word “ may ” was used only because the Legislature could not have enacted a mandatory provision requiring the Standing Committee or the Chief Officer to make a direction for institution of proceedings in all cases. This word was intended to give a discretion to the Standing Committee or the Chief Officer to make directions for taking proceedings only when they considered it appropriate that such a direction should be made and to avoid compelling the Standing Committee or the Chief Officer to make such directions in all cases. The use of this word “ may ” cannot be interpreted as laying down that, if a proceeding for punishment of any person for contravention of any of the provisions of the Act is to be instituted, it can be instituted in any manner without complying with the requirements of section 200 (1) of the Act. If the interpretation put by the High Court on this provision is accepted, it would mean that this provision was totally unnecessary, because there would be no need to confer power on the Standing Committee or the Chief Officer to make such directions if such directions could be made or proceedings instituted at the instance of any private individual. We cannot accept the submission that this provision was made in the Act simply by way of abundant caution. In fact, if the provision had been made with such an object in view, there is no reason why the power should have been expressed to be conferred on the Standing Committee and the Chief Officer only and not on the President of the Municipality. We, consequently, hold that, if any proceeding for punishment of any person for contravention of any of the provisions of the Act is to be instituted, it must be instituted in the manner laid down in section 200 (1) of the Act and in that manner only.”

It may be mentioned that the expression of the above opinion was based on a consideration of the previous decisions of this Court. Following the ratio of the above decision it would be legitimate to hold that the complaint, in the present case, could be filed under Rule 16 only by the Secretary of the Panchayat and by no one else. It may be pointed out that in the Act section 213 (3) is analogous to section 23-A (3) of the Bombay Act. On a parity of reasoning it could not be suggested that if there had been any contravention of section 213 (3) any voter or member of the public could have filed a complaint in the matter. The other provisions also of the Act which follow, namely, sections 214 to 219 indicate that it was never contemplated that a complaint for infringement or contravention of the prohibition contained therein could be lodged before a magistrate having jurisdiction under section 233 by any private individual in the presence of a specific rule that the Secretary shall have the power to file a complaint on behalf of the Panchayat. Most of these sections i.e., sections 217 and 218 postulate infractions of orders of the Panchayat for which the Panchayat alone would be interested in filing a complaint. We are satisfied that the scheme of the Act also supports the view which we are taking that a complaint could be filed only under rule 16 of Mysore Panchayat Secretaries' Powers and Duties Rules, 1961 and could not have been filed by a private complainant.

The High Court seems to have relied on section 236 of the Act which deals with powers of police officers. This section provides that any police officer may arrest any person committing in his presence any offence against any of the provisions of the Act or of any rule, regulation or bye-law made thereunder. The person arrested has to be produced before the nearest magistrate within a period of 24 hours of arrest. The police officer effecting the arrest must give immediate information to the Chairman or the Secretary of the Panchayat of the commission of such offence and give all assistance in the exercise of his lawful authority. The High Court was of the view that under the provision of this section the police officer could submit a charge-sheet under section 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code after necessary investigation for offences committed under the Act. Chapter II of the Act relates to establishment and constitution of Panchayats. There are certain sections in it which by express words make offences committed under them cognizable but in the same Chapter there are other sections which do not contain any such provision; for instance, sections 15, 17, 21 and 22 expressly provide that the offences committed under them would be cognizable but sections 16, 18, 19 and 20 do not contain any such provision. In other words the offences committed under them must be deemed to be not cognizable. Section 23 in the same Chapter says that no Court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable under section 16 or section 17 or under section 19 (2) (a) unless there is a complaint made by an order of or under authority from the Deputy Commissioner. The High Court was, therefore, not right in saying that all offences committed under the various provisions contained in the Act would be cognizable owing to the general powers conferred on police officers by section 236. Indeed that section gives only a limited power to the police officer to effect arrest if an offence is committed in his presence. There is authority for the view that this will make an offence cognizable within the meaning of section 4 (f) of the Criminal Procedure Code; vide *Public Prosecutor v. A. V. Ramiah*¹. In the absence of any express provision in section 220 with which we are concerned we doubt whether the offence committed under it would be cognizable and a police officer could carry on investigation in respect of it under Chapter XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code and finally submit a charge-sheet under section 173 of that Code.

It may also be pointed out that in the present case we are not concerned with the powers which a police officer can exercise in respect of an offence committed under section 220 of the Act. What has to be seen is whether a private person or an individual could file a complaint. In the presence of rule 16 and for the reasons given in *K. M. Kanavi v. Stats of Mysore*², we are of the opinion that it was the Secretary of the Panchayat who alone was competent to file the complaint. It must be remembered that it would be the panchayat that would be largely interested in taking action against any of its members and employees for the contravention of section 220. The Secretary would, therefore, be entitled to file a complaint on behalf of the panchayat. The difficulty felt by the High Court that a Secretary who is subordinate to the Chairman may find it embarrassing to file a complaint against him can hardly be accepted as serious hurdle in the way of coming to the conclusion at which we have arrived. The Secretary has to act on behalf of the panchayat and it is the panchayat that would be vitally interested in preventing and stopping any contravention of provisions like section 220 of the Act. The Secretary acts on behalf of the panchayat and the question of his subordination to any of its office-bearers is of no consequence.

In the view we have taken the appeal is allowed and the conviction and sentence imposed on each of the appellants is set aside.

Workmen of Indian Express Newspaper Private Ltd.

v.

The Management of Indian Express Newspaper Private Ltd. .. Respondent.

Labour Law—Individual dispute—Espousal by an outside union before the date of reference—Representative character—Claim of 25 per cent. of the Workmen of the establishment, if could give the union a representative character.

The question for determination is whether the Delhi Union of Journalists can be said to have espoused the dispute of the two workmen; if so, whether it did in time, and whether the union not being exclusively a union of the workmen employed in the respondent-company, could espouse the said cause.

Held that, the resolution dated 1st December, 1960, passed by the executive committee of the union was not disbelieved by the Tribunal. That, coupled with the fact that the union authorities initiated the conciliation proceeding, must mean that the union had espoused the cause of the two workmen. The dispute arose in July, 1959 when the management refused to treat the two workmen as proof-readers. Thereafter the executive committee, after considering a representation made to it by the employees of the respondent-company, as the resolution reads, passed the said resolution authorising the office-bearers of the union to initiate proceedings in the matter of the said dispute and the Secretary accordingly initiated proceedings before the conciliation officer. In these circumstances, it is not possible to appreciate how the espousal by the union can be said to be beyond time as such espousal can only take place after and not before the dispute arose, or the cause of action arose.

If the number of working journalists in the respondent-company were to be taken as 68, membership of the union by as many as 31 working journalists would certainly confer on the union a representative character. Even if the number of working journalists were to be taken 131, it would not be unreasonable to say that 31 i.e., about 25 per cent. of them would, by becoming the members of the union, give a representative character to the union. It is clear from the evidence that at the material time there was no union of working journalists employed by the respondent-company. Therefore, in accordance with the decision in The Workmen v. M/s. Dharampal Premchand, (1965) 3 S.C.R. 394 : (1965) 2 S.C.J. 818 the union can be said to have representative character qua the working journalists employed in the respondent-company. Though the grievance of the two workmen arose in July, 1959 when the management declined to accept them as proof-readers the union has sponsored their cause before the date of reference as laid down in the case of Hinhu, Bombay, (1962) 3 S.C.R. 893 : (1962) 2 S.C.J. 107. That being the position it cannot be gainsaid that the dispute was transformed into an industrial dispute as it was sponsored by a union which possessed a representative character vis-a-vis the working journalists in the employ of the respondent-company.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Award dated the 10th April, 1967 of the Industrial Tribunal, Delhi in Reference I.D. No. 241 of 1961.

M. K. Ramamurthi, Mrs. Shyamla Pappu, Vinet Kumar and Madan Mehan, Advocates, for Appellants.

S. V. Gupte, Senior Advocate, (Lalit Bhasin, S. K. Mehta and K. L. Mehta, Advocates, with him), for Respondent.

26th November, 1968.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Shelat, J.—Two workmen, Gulab Singh and Satya Pal, were appointed by the respondent-company in December, 1956, and February, 1955 respectively under the designation of copy-holders. It was alleged that they were entrusted with the duties of proof-readers and therefore they claimed that they should be treated as such. In July, 1959 the management issued an order in which the two workmen were described as copy-holders. It was alleged that in spite of this order the management continued to give the workmen the work of proof-readers. A dispute whether the two workmen should be treated as proof-readers having arisen and having been espoused by the Delhi Union of Journalists, the Delhi Administration, by a notification dated 2nd August, 1961 referred it to the Industrial Tribunal, Delhi.

The management contended that the said dispute was an individual dispute and not an Industrial dispute and that being so it was wrongly referred to the Tribunal and the Tribunal had no jurisdiction to adjudicate it. The Tribunal raised the preliminary issue, namely, whether the dispute relating to the said two workmen was an industrial dispute. The Tribunal held that it was not an industrial dispute but was only an individual dispute of the two workmen and therefore it had no jurisdiction to adjudicate the said reference. The workmen obtained Special Leave from this Court and that is how this appeal has come up before us for disposal.

Apart from the oral evidence, the appellants relied on two documents, Exhibit WW1/A, which purported to be the minutes of a meeting held on 15th November, 1960 of 17 working journalists and Exhibit WB/1 purporting to be the minutes of a meeting of the executive committee of the Delhi Union of Journalists held on 1st December, 1960. The Union maintained that these two resolutions were proof of espousal of the dispute, the first by an appreciable number of the co-workers of the two aggrieved workmen and the second by the union and therefore the dispute though originally an individual dispute was converted into an industrial dispute. The Tribunal rejected Exhibit WW1/A, namely, the minutes of the alleged meeting of the 17 working journalists in the employ of the respondent-company as unreliable. The Tribunal next considered whether, even assuming that the said 17 working journalists espoused the cause of the two workmen that espousal transformed the dispute in question into an industrial dispute, in other words, whether they constituted an appreciable number sufficient to change the dispute into an industrial dispute. At the material time the Branch office of the respondent-company at Delhi consisted in all of 388 employees, out of whom 140 were working in the Press. The working journalists numbered 131, out of whom 63 were outstation correspondents and the remaining 68 were working journalists performing their duties in Delhi and New Delhi. The Tribunal held that though the said 63 working journalists were outstation journalists they nevertheless belonged to the staff of the respondent-company's Delhi Branch, and therefore, could not be excluded from consideration. The question which the Tribunal posed to itself was whether 17 out of the said 131 working journalists could be said to be an appreciable number. According to the Tribunal, even if those 63 outstation correspondents were excluded and only 68 working journalists were considered, 17 of them would not constitute an appreciable number sufficient to convert the said dispute into an industrial dispute. It also held that mere passing of a resolution without anything done to follow it up was not sufficient to constitute espousal. There was no evidence that after passing the said alleged resolution on 15th November, 1960, anything further was done. On these facts the Tribunal did not consider the aforesaid resolution, assuming that it was passed, as constituting espousal.

As regards the resolution dated 1st December, 1960 the minutes of the meeting of the executive committee of the Delhi Union of Journalists were produced before the Tribunal. The minutes stated that the meeting after considering the representation made to it by the employees of the Indian Express decided to take up the case of the two workmen and authorised the office bearers of the union to initiate the necessary proceedings. The Tribunal found that the union initiated a fresh dispute before the Conciliation Officer and that there was no pending case initiated earlier, i.e., before 1st December, 1960, by another union as alleged by the appellants which could have been continued by the union. A copy of the statement of claim filed by the union before the Conciliation Officer was also produced before the Tribunal. There was evidence that 31 working journalists employed in the respondent-company had become the members of the Delhi Union of Journalists. But they had joined the union after the said order of July, 1959. The Tribunal's view was that the said 31 working journalists having joined the Delhi Union of Journalists after the cause of action had arisen in July, 1959, the said resolution of the union's executive committee would not constitute espousal as there would be no nexus between the dispute and the union, and therefore, the resolution dated 1st December, 1960, did not have the effect of converting the said dispute into an industrial dispute.

Mr. Ramamurti, for the appellants, contended that the resolution dated 1st December, 1960, coupled with the fact that the union initiated conciliation proceedings in respect of the demand of the said two workmen was sufficient to transform the dispute into an industrial dispute. On the other hand, Mr. Gupte, appearing for the company, contended that a dispute which is prima facie an individual dispute may assume the character of an industrial dispute if it is taken up or espoused by an appreciable body of the workmen of the establishment. Espousal by a union is regarded as sufficient, for, that means that it is an espousal by an appreciable number of workmen in that establishment. If such a dispute is espoused by an outside union, the workmen of the establishment, appreciable in number, must be members of such a union. On these contentions, the question for our determination is whether the Delhi Union of Journalists can be said to have espoused the dispute of the two workmen; if so, whether it did in time, and whether the union not being exclusively a union of the workmen employed in the respondent company, could espouse the said cause.

The resolution dated 1st December, 1960 passed by the executive committee of the union was not disbelieved by the Tribunal. That, coupled with the fact that the union authorities initiated the conciliation proceeding, must mean that the union had espoused the cause of the two workmen. The dispute arose in July, 1959 when the management refused to treat the two workmen as proof-readers. Thereafter the executive committee, after considering a representation made to it by the employees of the respondent company, as the resolution reads, passed the said resolutions authorising the office bearers of the union to initiate proceedings before the conciliation officer. In these circumstances, it is not possible to appreciate how the espousal by the union can be said to be beyond time as such espousal can only take place after and not before the dispute arose, or as counsel put it, the cause of action arose. In *The Bombay Union of Journalists v. The Hindu, Bombay*¹, this Court in clear terms laid down that the test of an industrial dispute is whether at the date of the reference the dispute was taken up and supported, by a union, or by an appreciable number of workmen. There being no doubt of the union having taken up the cause of the two workmen before the reference the first two parts of the question must be answered in the affirmative.

The next question is whether the cause of a workman in a particular establishment in an industry can be sponsored by a union which is not of workmen of that establishment but is one of which membership is open to workmen of other establishments in that industry. In *Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd. v. Raghunath Gopal Patwardhan*², this Court noted that decided cases in India disclosed their views as to the meaning of an industrial dispute: (1) a dispute between an employer and a single workman cannot be an industrial dispute, (2) it can be an industrial dispute and (3) it cannot per se be an industrial dispute but may become one if taken up by a trade union or a number of workmen. After discussing the scope of industrial dispute as defined in section 2 (k) of the Act it observed that the preponderance of judicial opinion was clearly in favour of the last of the three views and that there was considerable reason behind it. In *the Newspapers Ltd. v. The State Industrial Tribunal, U.P.*¹, the third respondent was employed as a lino typist by the appellant company. On an allegation of incompetence he was dismissed from service. His case was not taken up by any union of workers of the appellant company, nor by any of the unions of workmen employed in similar or allied trades. But the U. P. Working Journalists Union, Lucknow, with which the third respondent had no concern, took the matter to the Conciliation Board. On a reference being made to the Industrial Tribunal by the Government the legality of that reference was challenged by the appellant company on the ground that the said dispute could not be treated as an industrial dispute under the U. P. Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 which defined by section 2 an industrial dispute as having the same meaning assigned to it in section 2 (k) of the Central Act. This Court upheld the contention observing that the notification referring the said dispute proceeded on an assumption that a dispute existed between the employer and "his workmen," that Tajammul Hussain, the workman concerned, could not be described as "workmen," nor could the U. P. Working Journalists Union be called "his workmen" nor was there any evidence to show that a dispute had got transformed into an industrial dispute. The question whether the union sponsoring a dispute must be the union of workmen in the establishment in which the workman concerned is employed or not had not so far arisen. It seems such a question arose for the first time in the case of *Bombay Union of Journalists v. The Hindu, Bombay*². The decision in that case laid down (1) that the Industrial Disputes Act excluded its application to an individual dispute as distinguished from a dispute involving a group of workmen unless such a dispute is made a common cause by a body or a considerable section of workmen and (2) the members of a union who are not workmen of the employer against whom the dispute is sought to be raised cannot by their support convert an individual dispute into an industrial dispute. Persons who seek to support the cause must themselves be directly and substantially interested in the dispute and persons who are not the employees of the same employer cannot be regarded as so interested. The Court held that the dispute there being prima facie an individual dispute it was necessary in order to convert it into an industrial dispute that it should be taken up by a union of the employees of an appreciable number of employees of Hindu, Bombay. The Bombay Union of Journalists not being a union of the employees of the Hindu, Bombay, but a union of all employees in the industry of journalism in Bombay, its support of the cause of the workman concerned would not convert the individual dispute into an industrial dispute. The members of such a union cannot be said to be persons substantially and directly interested in the dispute between the workman concerned and his employer, the Hindu Bombay, But in *Workmen v. M/s. Dharampal Premchand*³, this Court, after reviewing the previous decisions, distinguished the case of Hindu, Bombay and held that notwithstanding the width of the words used in section 2 (k) of the Act a dispute raised by an individual workman cannot become an industrial dispute unless it is supported either by his union or in the absence of a union by a number of workmen, that a union may validly raise a dispute though it may be a minority union of the workmen employed in an establishment, that if there was no union of workmen in an establishment a group of employees can raise the dispute which becomes an industrial dispute even though it is a dispute relating to an individual workman, and lastly, that where the workmen of an establishment have no union of their own and some or all of them have joined a union of another establishment belonging to the same industry, if such a union takes up the cause of the workman working in an establishment which has no union of its own, the dispute would become an industrial dispute if such a union can claim a representative character in a way that its support would make the dispute an industrial dispute.

The evidence of the union secretary was that in 1959-60, 31 working journalists of the respondent company were members of the Delhi Union of Journalists. It was nobody's case that these 31 members did not continue to be the members of that union in 1960-61 also. If the number of working journalists in the respondent company were to be taken as 69, membership of the union by as many as 31 working journalists would certainly confer on the union a representative character. Even if the number of working journalists were to be taken as 131, it would not be unreasonable to say that 31 i.e., about 25 per cent. of them would, by becoming members of the union, give a representative character to the union. It is clear from the evidence that at the material time there was no union of working journalists employed by the respondent company. Therefore, in accordance with the decision in *The Workmen v. M/s. Dharampal Premchand*¹, the union can be said to have a representative character qua the working journalists employed in the respondent company. There can be no doubt that the union had taken up the cause of the two workmen by its executive committee passing the said resolution and its office bearers having followed up that resolution by taking the matter before the conciliation officer. Though the grievance of the two workmen arose in July 1959 when the management declined to accept them as proof-readers the union has sponsored their cause before the date of reference as laid down in the case of *Hindu, Bombay*². That being the position it cannot be gainsaid that the dispute was transformed into an industrial dispute as it was sponsored by a union which possessed a representative character vis-a-vis the working journalists in the employ of the respondent company.

We must, therefore, hold that the Tribunals' view that the dispute was not an industrial dispute was incorrect. The award, therefore, will have to be set aside and the appeal of the workmen allowed. There will be no order as to costs.

An application asking for amendment of the plea of conversion of the answering respondent into one of his parents. Cannot be allowed because it changes the nature of the case requiring fresh evidence to be taken and is also filed beyond the period of limitation prescribed for election petitions.

It is because of clumsy blundering that the petitioner undertook a much greater burden than the law required him to take. He should have pleaded only that the returned candidate was a Christian on the date he filed his nomination paper and therefore was not a Hindu and was not competent to stand for the Reserved Seat. Instead he proceeded to demonstrate through his plea and his evidence that the returned candidate was himself converted to Christianity and failed. Therefore he cannot be allowed to change his front and narrow the field of enquiry to one which he should have adopted in the first instance. Not having done so, it is too late for him to change his case now.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hidayatullah, C.J.—This appeal arises from the decision of the Andhra Pradesh High Court dated 21st August, 1967 by which an election petition filed by the present appellant Goka Ramalingam to question the election of the answering respondent Boddu Abraham was dismissed. The matter concerns the Cheriyaal (Scheduled Caste) constituency in the election to the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Assembly held in February, 1967. Three candidates had offered themselves for election. Two of them we have already named, the third is one Devadanam. The answering respondent obtained 15000 and odd, appellant-election petitioner 12000 and odd and Devadanam 7000 and odd votes. The election petition was based only on one issue, namely, that the respondents who had stood for a scheduled caste Reserved seat had “converted themselves into Christianity long time back and they continue to profess the said religion Christianity even today.” Under the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950, it is provided as follows:—

“(2) Subject to the provisions of this Order, the castes, races or tribes or parts of, or groups within, castes or tribes, specified in Parts I to XIII of the Scheduled to this Order shall, in relation to the States to which those parts respectively relate, be deemed to be Scheduled Castes so far as regards members thereof resident in the localities specified in relation to them in those parts of that Schedule.

(3) Notwithstanding anything contained in paragraph 2, no person who professes a religion different from the Hindu or the Sikh religion shall be deemed to be a member of a Scheduled Caste.”

It would therefore appear that if the answering respondent and Devadanam were not members of a named scheduled caste (in this case the Madiga caste) they were not eligible to stand for election for the Reserved Seat. The case as put forward in the High Court was that these two candidates had themselves got converted into Christianity a long time ago and that they did not therefore profess Hindu religion although in the plea it is stated affirmatively that they profess Christian religion. The case went to trial on this plea and the issues framed were as follows:

“1. Whether the respondents who admittedly once belonged to “Madiga” community embraced Christianity and professed the religion of Christianity at the time of election and hence respondent No. 1 was not qualified to be chosen to fill the seat in the Assembly of the State as per section 5 (a) read with rule (3) of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950 (C.O. 19 dated 10th August, 1950)?

2. Whether the nomination papers of both the respondents were improperly received and as a result thereof the result of the election has been materially affected?

3. What is the effect of admission of respondent 2 in his written statement as to his status on this election petition?”

Evidence was led to prove that the answering respondent was converted to Christianity. This evidence was not accepted by the High Court. As regards the other respondent, he went out of the fight admitting that he was a Christian and nothing more need be said of him.

It appears that while this case was going on, the learned Judge was informed that a Register of all converted Christians was maintained by the Church. He accordingly sent for the Register and marked it as Exhibit C-1. In the judgment the learned Judge gives his order: pertaining to this action. It reads as follows:—

"I may mention here that since it came out in the evidence of R.W. 2 that the names of all converts to Christianity within the jurisdiction of Hanumakonda Baptist Mission would be entered in the General Record of the Field Association, Houmakonda, and that register was filed as an exhibit in a suit pending in the District Court at Warangal, I summoned it and marked it as Exhibit C-1. I gave opportunity for the lawyers appearing on both sides to inspect the register and make their submissions. The entries relating to Dharmasangaram village are to be found in pages 50 to 51 and 182. It is true that the name of the 1st respondent is not found in this Record; but since this register does not appear to be an exhaustive and complete record of all the Christians in that area, I do not propose to rely on the entries in this register for any purpose."

This Register was inspected by the parties. They went into it with a view to finding out whether the answering respondent and his wife Chinna Mariamma has been converted or not. There was no entry showing that they had been so converted. It appears, however, that the Register did contain two entries showing the conversion of Boddu Kumaraiah and China Buchamma who are now said to be the father and mother of answering respondent. An affidavit has also been filed from the Pastor of the Church in which it is stated that these entries refer to the parents of the answering respondent. Even though the Register was in Court and was open to inspection of the parties, care was not taken to discover these two names, with the result that the case was fought on the original plea and issue that the answering respondent was converted to Christianity. That apparently was not a fact, because if he was born of Christian parents he did not need conversion. That fact, however, is only alleged now before us and has not been subjected to proof.

The question therefore is whether in view of this fresh evidence, we should allow this appeal. On a proper consideration of the entire matter we are of opinion that we cannot. An application was made to us asking for amendment of the plea of conversion of the answering respondent into one of conversion of his parents to Christianity. We have been unable to allow that petition, because it changes the nature of the case requiring fresh evidence to be taken and is filed also beyond the period of limitation prescribed for filing of election petitions. That it does change the entire nature of the case is obvious, because instead of the plea that the answering respondent was converted to Christianity, it is now sought to be substituted a plea that the parents were converted to Christianity. We should have understood such an application being made in the Court of trial when the Register was produced, because that might have been a matter not within the knowledge of the election petitioner till the register was produced. But after the Register had been produced and it lay in the Court for nearly an year and had been inspected by the answering respondent, it does not lie in his mouth to say that he had no notice of the true facts. He had notice of them because he had the register with him and the names of the alleged parents of the answering respondent are clearly mentioned therein. In fact the register seems to be a well-kept document written extremely legibly and there was no danger of any name having been overlooked. Therefore we must consider this as a belated plea and reject it on the two grounds already mentioned by us.

Once the application for amendment is out of the way, the question is whether the appeal of the election petitioner can be otherwise sustained. Mr. Ram Reddy contended that under clause (3) of the Presidential Order, it is sufficient to prove that if a person possesses religion other than Hinduism or Sikhism it disentitles him to contest for a reserved seat. He says that for whatever reason the answering respondent be regarded as a Christian today or at any rate at the time he filed his nomination paper, he would be incompetent to stand for the election from the reserved seat if he professed a religion other than Hinduism or Sikhism. In other words, he wants to extract from the plea and the issue a very much narrower field for enquiry, namely, that the answering respondent was not a Hindu on that date. This would have been a proper plea to take in the first instance. It is because of clumsy blundering that the petitioner undertook a much greater burden than the law required him to take. He should have pleaded only that the returned candidate was a Christian on the date he filed his nomination paper and therefore was not a Hindu and was not competent to stand for the Reserved Seat. Instead he proceeded to demonstrate through his plea and his evidence that the returned candidate was himself converted to Christianity and failed. In this view of the matter we do not think that we should allow him to change his front and narrow the field of enquiry to one which he should have adopted in the first instance. Not having done so, we think, that it is too late for him to change his case now. For these reasons, we are constrained to dismiss the appeal. We may say that it is an odd situation, because probably a Christian occupies a Reserved Seat, but this is the result of the vagaries of litigation which have to be carried on according to rules. The rules do not permit us to give relief where the party himself is at fault in making a wrong plea and in not making the right plea in time. But in the circumstances of the case, we think that the parties should be directed to bear their costs throughout.

Res judicata—Deity, not a necessary party, joined as a defendant—No relief claimed against the deity—Appeal against the dismissal of the suit—Appeal dismissed against deity for non-payment of guardian's costs—No final decision by the appellate Court against the deity on the question of the title to suit lands—Decision of the Trial Court, if operates as res judicata.

The deity was not a necessary party to the suit. It was joined as a defendant, but no relief was claimed against it. The suit was dismissed. As soon as the appeal was filed by the plaintiffs in the High Court the decision of the Trial Court lost its character of finality and the question whether the suit lands appertained to village Siripur Majraha became once again res sub judice. Before the appeal was finally heard and decided, it was dismissed as against the deity for non-payment of its guardian's costs. The appellate Court did not give any decision on the merits of the case in the presence of the deity. There is no final decision against the deity on the question of the title to suit lands. The decision of the appellate Court against the contesting defendants will not lead to conflicting and inconsistent decree. The High Court was in error in holding that the appeal against the contesting defendants became incompetent.

. Sarjoo Prasad, Senior Advocate, (B. P. Jha, Advocate, with him), for Appellants.

G. B. Agarwala, Senior Advocate, (P. K. Chatterjee and R. B. Datar, Advocates, with him), for Respondents (excepting Respondents Nos. 15 (b) to 15 (d)).

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Bachawat, J.—This appeal arises out of Title Suit No. 12/9 of the 1946 instituted in the Court of the First Additional Subordinate Judge, Darbhanga. The plaintiff claimed declaration of their title and possession in respect of 70 bighas of land in plot No. 1083 in village Siripur Majraha. They obtained settlements of the lands from the deity Shri Radhakrishnajee Baldeojee. The deity was the 16 annas proprietor of village Siripur Majraha Pergana Janakhalpur, Tauzi No. 2794. The river Karey flows between this village and the villages of Kazi Dumra and Shankarpur. The contesting defendants were the landlords and tenants of villages

Kazi Dumra and Shankarpur. The deity was defendant No. 18 and was represented by one Tantreshwar Singh. The plaintiffs claimed that in consequence of the changes in the Channel of the river Karey the lands in suit were lost to villages Kazi Dumra and Shankarpur by diluvion and were annexed to plot No. 1083 in village Sirpur Majraha by gradual increment and accretion. The Trial Court dismissed the suit. It held that (1) the suit lands did not accrete to plots Nos. 1083 and 1089 in village Sirpur Majraha due to slow, gradual and imperceptible changes in the channel of the river Karey, (2) there was no custom in the village by which the disputed lands became the property of the owner of plots, (3) the deity Radha Krishanji Baldeoji or the owner of village Sirpur Majraha did not obtain possession of the lands in the manner alleged in the plaint, (4) the lands originally belonged to the proprietors of villages Kazi Dumra and Shankarpur and continued to be their property and (5) the plaintiffs failed to prove their title and possession in respect of the suit lands within 12 years before the date of the institution of the suit. The plaintiffs filed F.A. No. 291 of 1951 in the High Court of Patna against the decree passed by the Trial Court. The deity Shri Radha Krishanji Baldeoji, the original defendant No. 18 was impleaded as respondent No. 23 in the appeal. By an order dated 24th January, 1952 the High Court appointed the Deputy Registrar as the guardian of the deity. On 18th February, 1952 the High Court passed the following order:—

“Two weeks further time is allowed to deposit D. R. guardian's cost for respondent No. 23 (deity) failing which this appeal shall stand dismissed against him without further reference to a Bench.”

This peremptory order was not complied with and on the expiry of the two weeks the appeal stood dismissed against the deity. At the hearing of the appeal the contesting defendants urged that the entire appeal became incompetent in view of the dismissal of the appeal against the deity. The High Court accepted this contention and dismissed the appeal in its entirety. The High Court held that there was a clear issue between defendant No. 18 and the contesting defendants as to whether the lands formed part of the village Sirpur Majraha, that the issue stood concluded against defendant No. 18 by the decree of the Trial Court, that the appeal had abated against defendant No. 18 and that as success in the appeal might lead to conflicting and inconsistent decrees, the appeal against all the defendants became incompetent. The present appeal has been filed by the plaintiffs after obtaining a certificate from the High Court.

Clearly, the High Court was in error in holding that the appeal had abated either wholly or in part. None of the parties to the appeal had died and there was no question of the abatement of the appeal. Mr. C. B. Agarwala relying on the case of *Munni Bibi v. Trilokinath*¹, submitted that the decision of the Trial Court on the question whether the suit lands appertained to village Sirpur Majraha operated as res judicata between the deity and the contesting co-defendants, that the appellate Court could not record an inconsistent finding that the suit lands appertained to village Sirpur Majraha, and that in the circumstances, the entire appeal before the High Court became incompetent. We are unable to accept these contentions.

The plaintiff's claiming as tenants of the deity sued the contesting defendants for declaration of their title and possession in respect of the suit lands on the allegation that the lands appertained to village Sirpur Majraha of which the deity was the proprietor. The deity was not a necessary party to the suit. It was joined as a defendant, but no relief was claimed against it. The suit was dismissed on the finding that the suit lands did not appertain to village Sirpur Majraha. The plaintiffs filed an appeal against the decree impleading the deity as one of the respondents. The appeal was dismissed against the deity for non-payment of costs of its guardian ad litem. The deity was not a necessary party to the appeal. The plaintiffs were entitled to prosecute their appeal against the contesting defendants in the absence of the deity.

As soon as the appeal was filed by the plaintiffs in the High Court the decision of the Trial Court lost its character of finality and the question whether the suit lands appertained to village Siripur Majrahia became once again res sub judice. The case of *Munni Bibi v. Trilokinath*¹, shows that a decision operates as res judicata between co-defendants if (1) there is a conflict of interest between them; (2) it is necessary to decide that conflict in order to give the plaintiffs the reliefs which they claim and (3) the question between the co-defendants is finally decided. In the present case, the third condition was not satisfied. The question whether the suit lands appertain to Siripur Majrahia was not finally decided between the deity and the co-defendants. On the filing of the appeal by plaintiffs, the question became once more the subject of judicial inquiry between the deity and the contesting defendants.

Before the appeal was finally heard and decided, it was dismissed as against the deity for non-payment of its guardian's costs. The appellate Court did not give any decision on the merits of the case in the presence of the deity. There is no final decision against the deity on the question of the title to the suit lands. The decision of the appellate Court against the contesting defendants will not lead to conflicting and inconsistent decree. The High Court was in error in holding that the appeal against the contesting defendants became incompetent.

In the circumstances the High Court ought to have decided the appeal before it on the merits. Counsel for the parties agreed that the decision of the present appeal on the merits would abide by the decision in C. A. No. 140 of 1966 arising out of T. S. No. 29/11 of 1946. That suit and T. S. No. 12/19 of 1946 out of which the present appeal arises were heard together by the Trial Court and disposed of by a common judgment. In C. A. No. 140 of 1966 we have held that the disputed lands appertained originally to village Kazi Dumra and Shankarpur, that due to the recession of the river Karey the lands re-formed in situ and that the property in the lands continued to remain with the proprietors of the lands in villages Kazi Dumra and Shankarpur. The plaintiffs failed to prove that the deity Shri Radha Krishanji Baldeoji came into possession of the disputed land as alleged in the plaint. There was no issue on the question whether the deity had acquired title to the suit lands by adverse possession. The plea for the acquisition of title by adverse possession cannot be raised for the first time at the appellate stage. The plaintiffs failed to establish acquisition of the title of the deity to any portion of the suit lands by adverse possession. It follows that there was no merit in F.A. No. 235 of 1951. Although the High Court did not decide this appeal on the merits, it is not necessary to remand the matter to the High Court. Having regard to our findings in C.A. No. 140 of 1966. T.S. No. 12/9 of 1946 also must be dismissed.

In the result, the appeal is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

Workmen of the Indian Leaf Tobacco Development Co. Ltd., Guntur .. Appellants*

The Management of Indian Leaf Tobacco Development Co. Ltd.,
Guntur .. Respondent.Labour Law—Closure of business of the company, genuine and real—Stoppage of part of a business (closure of 8 depots by the Company), if could be interfered with by an Industrial Tribunal—Closure entirely in the discretion of the company.Labour Law—Closure of part of business of the company—Closure genuine and real to effect economy and secure quality—Discharge of workmen on payment of retrenchment compensation.—Tribunal, if could ask the company to reinstate the workmen.

The closure of the 8 depots by the respondent—company, even if it is held not to amount to closure of business of the company, cannot be interfered with by an Industrial Tribunal if, in fact, that closure was genuine and real. The closure may be treated as stoppage of part of the activity or business of the company. Such stoppage of part of a business is an act of management which is entirely in the discretion of the company carrying on the business. No Industrial Tribunal, even in a reference under section 10 (1) (d) of the Industrial Disputes Act, can interfere with the discretion exercised in such a matter and can have any power to direct a company to continue a part of the business which the company has decided to shut down. A Tribunal under the Industrial Disputes Act has no power to issue orders directing a company to re-open a closed depot or branch, if the company, in fact, closes it down.

After examining the evidence, the Tribunal came to the conclusion that the stoppage of the work at the depots was genuine and that the work which was being carried on at the depots had not been transferred to the buying points established by the Company. The closure of the business at the depots was necessitated by reasons of expediency inasmuch as the company had to reduce its purchases in its quest for quality and its desire to run the business economically. The principal work which used to be done at the depots, was not that of purchasing tobacco, but of handling it and that work was not transferred at all to any buying point. The Tribunal, thus came to the finding that the closure of these depots was real and genuine. The suggestion that only, a device was adopted of carrying on the same business in a different manner had no force at all. If the same business had been continued, though under a different guise, the claim of the workmen not to be retrenched could possibly be considered by the Tribunal, but, on the finding that there was a genuine closure of the business that used to be carried on at the depots, no question could arise of retrenchment being set aside by the Tribunal. The Tribunal could not ask the company to re-employ or reinstate the workmen, because there was no business for which the workmen could be required.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Order dated the 13th August, 1964 of the Industrial Tribunal, Andhra Pradesh in Industrial Dispute No. 41 of 1963.

M. K. Ramamurthi, Mrs. Shyamala Pappu and Mr. Vinod Kumar, Advocates, for Appellants.

K. Srinivasamurthy and Naimit Lal, Advocates, for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Bhargava, J.—This appeal, by Special Leave, has arisen out of an award made by the Industrial Tribunal, Andhra Pradesh, at Hyderabad in an Industrial dispute between the respondent, the Indian Leaf Tobacco Development Company Limited, Guntur (hereinafter referred to as “the Company”), and its workmen. Admittedly, the Company is an associate of the Imperial Tobacco Company Ltd. and the main business carried on by the Company is that of purchasing tobacco of all varieties and qualities, stemming, grading and packing of tobacco and supplying it to the Imperial Tobacco Co., as well as exporting the tobacco to various foreign countries in the world. The Company has been carrying on this business for about 40 years and handles almost 35 per cent of the tobacco grown in the State of Andhra Pradesh. For the work of stemming, grading and packing tobacco, the Company has two factories, one at Anaparty in East Godavary District, and the other at Chirala in Guntur District. In connection with this business, the Company, in the year 1962, was maintaining 21 depots where, according to the workmen, the appellants, the Company was carrying on the work of collecting tobacco, though the Company's case was that the principal work done at these depots was that of handling the tobacco purchased at other places and only included the work of purchasing tobacco on a small scale.

On 16th August, 1963, the Company gave a notice to the Union of the appellant workmen that 8 out of 21 depots mentioned therein would be closed down with effect from 30th September, 1963. Thereafter, an industrial dispute was raised by the workmen which related to the closure of these 8 depots, as well as to a number of other demands, including revision of basic wages and dearness allowance, additional discomfort allowance, etc. The State Government, by its order dated 14th November, 1963, referred the dispute for adjudication under section 10 (1) (d) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 to the Industrial Tribunal, Hyderabad. The first issue, which was referred for adjudication, was as follows :—

“How far the demands of the union, viz., that no depot which worked during 1962 season should be closed, and (ii) that no workman who worked in 1962 season should be retrenched, are justified?”

There were ten other issues, but we need not reproduce them, as we are not concerned with them in this appeal.

In the proceedings for adjudication, the Company took a preliminary objection that the closure of the depots was a managerial function, that there could not be an industrial dispute over such closure, that the Government, therefore, had no power to refer this issue for adjudication, and that the Tribunal also had no power to adjudicate on it. Thereupon, the Tribunal framed a preliminary issue as to “whether the employer is justified in alleging that Issue No. 1 framed by the Government cannot be deemed related to an industrial dispute, and as such, whether the Government had the power to refer it for adjudication.” The Tribunal decided this preliminary issue by giving an interim award on the 13th August, 1964. The preliminary objection was allowed and further direction was made that the effect of this decision on Issue No. 1 will be decided later after hearing the parties. Thereafter, the Tribunal proceeded to hear the reference on this question as well as on all other issues referred to it and, ultimately, gave its award on 11th December, 1964. In that award, both the parts of issue No. 1 were decided against the workmen. The workmen have now come up in this appeal against the interim award, dated 13th August, 1964 as well as against the final award insofar as it relates to issue No. 1.

The decision given by the Tribunal in the interim award, holding that the reference covered by issue No. 1 was not competent, has been challenged by learned Counsel for the appellants on the ground that the closure of a depot does not amount to closure of business in law and, since the same business was continued by the Company at least 13 other depots, the closure of the 8 depots in question was unjustified

For the proposition that the closure of the depots did not amount to closure of business, learned Counsel relied on the views expressed by this Court in *Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd. v. Pipraich Sugar Mills Mazdoor Union*¹, where the Court explained the reason for the decision given by the Labour Appellate Tribunal in the case of *Employees of Messrs. India Reconstruction Corporation Ltd., Calcutta v. Messrs. India Reconstruction Corporation Ltd., Calcutta*². It, however, appears to us that this question raised on behalf of the appellants is totally immaterial insofar as the question of the jurisdiction of the Tribunal to decide the first part of issue No. 1 is concerned. The closure of the 8 depots by the Company, even if it is held not to amount to closure of business of the Company, cannot be interfered with by an Industrial Tribunal if, in fact, that closure was genuine and real. The closure may be treated as stoppage of part of the activity or business of the Company. Such stoppage of part of a business is an act of management which is entirely in the discretion of the Company carrying on the business. No Industrial Tribunal, even in a reference under section 10 (1) (d) of the Industrial Disputes Act, can interfere with discretion exercised in such a matter and can have any power to direct a Company to continue a part of the business which the Company has decided to shut down. We cannot possibly accept the submission made on behalf of the appellants that a Tribunal under the Industrial Disputes Act has power to issue orders directing a Company to reopen a closed depot or branch, if the Company, in fact, closes it down.

An example may be taken of a case where a Bank with its headquarters in one place and a number of branches at different places decides to close down one of the branches at one of those places where it is functioning. We cannot see how, in such a case, if the employees of that particular branch raise an industrial dispute, the Bank can be directed by the Industrial Tribunal to continue to run that branch. It is for the Bank to decide whether the business of the branch should be continued or not, and no Bank can be compelled to continue a branch which it considers undesirable to do.

In these circumstances, it is clear that the demand contained in the first part of Issue No. 1 was beyond the powers and jurisdiction of the Industrial Tribunal and was incorrectly referred for adjudication to it by the State Government.

Of course, if a Company closes down a branch or a depot, the question can always arise as to the relief to which the workmen of that branch or depot are entitled and, if such a question arises and becomes the subject-matter of an industrial dispute, an Industrial Tribunal will be fully competent to adjudicate on it. It is unfortunate that, in this case, when dealing with the preliminary issue, the Tribunal expressed its decision in the interim award in general words, holding that Issue No. 1 as a whole was beyond its jurisdiction. If the reasoning in the interim award is taken into account, it is clear that the Tribunal on that reasoning only came to the conclusion that it was not competent to direct reopening of the 8 depots which had been closed, so that the Tribunal should have held that the first part of Issue No. 1 only was outside its jurisdiction.

So far as the second part of that issue is concerned, as we have said above, it was competent for the Tribunal to go into it and decide whether the claim of the workmen that they should not be retrenched was justified. On an examination of the interim award and the final award, we, however, find that the Tribunal in fact did do so. The case reported in *Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd.*¹, was also concerned only with the question as to the relief that can be granted to workmen when there is closure of a business. No question arose either before the Court, or in the cases considered by the Court, of an Industrial Tribunal making a direction to the employers to continue to run or to reopen a closed branch of the business. The Labour

Appellate Tribunal in the case of *Employees of Messrs. India Reconstruction Corporation Ltd., Calcutta*¹, was dealing with the question of retrenchment compensation as a result of the closure of one of the units of the company concerned, and it held that the workmen were entitled to retrenchment compensation in accordance with law. This Court, in the case of *Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd.*², only explained why the Labour Appellate Tribunal was justified in granting retrenchment compensation in that case. The opinion expressed by the Court was that, though there is discharge of workmen both when there is retrenchment and closure of business, the compensation is to be awarded under the law, not for discharge as such but for discharge on retrenchment, and if, as is conceded, retrenchment means in ordinary parlance discharge of the surplus, it cannot include discharge on closure of business. It was in this context that the Court went on to add that in the case of *Employees of M/s. India Reconstruction Corporation Ltd., Calcutta*¹, what had happened was that one of the units of the Company had been closed which would be a case of retrenchment and not a case of closure of business. It may be noted that, at the time when this decision was given, section 25-FF and section 25-FFF had not been introduced in the Industrial Disputes Act, and the only right to retrenchment compensation granted to the workmen was conferred by section 25-F. It was in the light of the law then prevailing that the Court felt that the decision of the Labour Appellate Tribunal in the case of *Employees of M/s. India Reconstruction Corporation Ltd.*¹, granting retrenchment compensation could be justified on the ground that the services of the workmen had not been dispensed with as a result of closure of business, but as a result of retrenchment. That question does not arise in the case before us. Since then, as we have indicated above, section 25-FF and section 25-FFF have been added in the Industrial Disputes Act, and the latter section specifically lays down what rights a workman has when an undertaking is closed down. In a case where a dispute may arise as to whether workmen discharged are entitled to compensation under section 25-F or section 25-FFF it may become necessary to decide whether the closure, as a result of which the services have been dispensed with, amounts to a closure in law or not. In the case before us, it was admitted by learned Counsel for both parties that the workmen, who have been discharged as a result of the closure of the 8 depots of the Company, have all been paid retrenchment compensation at the higher rate laid down in section 25-F, so that, in this case, it is not necessary to decide the point raised on behalf of the workmen.

In connection with the second part of issue No. 1, it was also urged by learned Counsel for the appellants that the business, which was being carried on at the depots, had not in fact been closed down and had merely been transferred to buying points situated in and around the closed depots, including two new buying points established by the Company after the closure of these 8 depots. The argument was that the workmen were old employees who had served the Company for a long time and were entitled to certain benefits as a result of that long service. The Company closed these 8 depots malà fide with the object of depriving the workmen of those benefits and merely altered the nature of the business by closing the depots and carrying on the same business at the buying points. This point urged by learned Counsel cannot, however, be accepted in view of the findings of fact recorded by the Tribunal.

The Tribunal examined in detail the allegations made on behalf of the workmen in this respect. In fact, the interim award mentions that, for the purpose of deciding the preliminary issue and the first issue, evidence was recorded by the Tribunal for more than a week and arguments of Advocates of the parties were heard for even a longer period. After examining the evidence, the Tribunal came to the conclusion that the stoppage of the work at the depots was genuine and that the work which was being carried on at the depots had not been transferred to the buying points established by the Company. The closure of the business at the depots was necessitated by reasons of expediency inasmuch as the Company had to reduce its purchases in its quest for quality and its desire to run the business economically. The principal work, which used to be done at the depots, was not that of purchasing tobacco, but of handling it and that work was not transferred at all to any buying point. The Tribunal, thus, came to the finding that the closure of these depots was real and genuine and that the suggestion of the appellants that only a device was adopted of carrying on the same business in a different manner had no force at all. If the same business had been continued, though under a different guise, the claim of the workmen not to be retrenched could possibly be considered by the Tribunal; but, on the finding that there was a genuine closure of the business that used to be carried on at the depots, no question could arise of the retrenchment being set aside by the Tribunal. The Tribunal could not ask the Company to re-employ or reinstate the workmen, because there was no business for which the workmen could be required. In these circumstances all that the workmen could claim was compensation for loss of their service and in that respect, as we have indicated above, the workmen have received adequate compensation.

Consequently, the appeal has no force and is dismissed; but we make no order as to costs.

Kundan Singh and others

.. Respondents.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), sections 16, 30 and 62 (2) and Part III—Scope—Election petition—Electoral roll, challenge of—Voter, if incurs disqualification, by becoming a Government servant by the time the polling took place.

The mandate of sub-section (3) of section 23 of the Representation of the People Act, 1950 is plain and unambiguous. It prohibits inclusion of any name in the electoral roll after the prescribed date whether the application for inclusion was made before or after that date.

Can it be said that the vote of T.S. was void as by the time the polling took place, as he had become a Government servant?

Held that, section 62 (2) of the 1950 Act says that no person shall vote at an election in any constituency if he is subject to any of the disqualifications referred to in section 16 of the Act. There is no provision in section 16 to his qualify him (T.S.) from voting. There is no other provision of law in the Act or in any other law disqualifying him from exercising his vote. The right to vote being purely a statutory right, the validity of any vote has to be examined on the basis of the provisions of the Act. Part III of the 1950 Act deals with the preparation of rolls in a constituency. Sections 14 to 24 of the 1950 Act are integrated provisions. They form a complete code by themselves in the matter of preparation and maintenance of electoral rolls. It is clear from those provisions that the entries found in the electoral roll are final and they are not open to challenge either before a civil Court or before a tribunal which considers the validity of any election. The finality of the electoral roll cannot be challenged in a proceeding challenging the validity of the election.

Appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 from the Judgment and Order dated the 20th March, 1969 of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Election Petition No. 1 of 1968.

Hardev Singh, Advocate, for Appellant.

R.K. Garg, S.C. Agarwala and D.P. Singh, Advocates of M/s. Ramamurthi & Co., and Miss Sumitra Chakravarti, Advocate, for Respondent No. 1.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—This appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 (to be shortly referred to hereinafter as the Act) is directed against the decision of the High Court of Punjab and Haryana in Election Petition No. 1 of 1968 on its file. In that election petition, Kundan Singh, the 1st respondent to this appeal challenged the validity of the returning Officer's declaration that the appellant has been duly elected from the Hoshiarpur Local Authorities Constituency to the Punjab Legislative Council in the election held in April, 1968. The High Court came to the conclusion that some of the votes polled in that election were invalid votes and if the valid votes alone are taken into consideration, as it should have been, then the 1st respondent is entitled to be declared elected. It accordingly set aside the declaration made in favour of the appellant and declared the 1st respondent as having been duly elected.

We may now briefly state the material facts. In March, 1968, the Hoshiarpur Local Authorities Constituency was called upon to elect one member to the Punjab Legislative Council. The election calendar was as follows :

- (1) The last date for filing nomination papers—12-3-1968.
- (2) Date of scrutiny of the nomination papers—13-3-1968.
- (3) The last date for withdrawal of candidatures—16-3-1968.
- (4) Date of polling—7-4-1968.
- (5) Date of counting and declaration of result—8-4-1968.

In that election, as many as five candidates contested. They are the appellant and the respondents herein. On 8th April, 1968, the returning officer after counting the votes cast declared the appellant to be the successful candidate as he had secured one vote more than the 1st respondent. The 1st respondent challenged that declaration in the aforementioned election petition on various grounds of which, at present, we are only concerned with one, viz., that the vote of Hari Singh should have been held to be a void vote as his name was included in the electoral roll on 5th April, 1968, i.e., just two days before the date of polling. In his turn the appellant filed a recriminatory petition contending inter alia that the vote of Tarsem Singh was void as by the time the polling took place, he had become a Government servant and the votes of two other persons namely Harjinder Singh and Balwant Singh were void as their names were included in the electoral roll after the last date for filing nominations for the election. Other grounds taken in the recriminatory petition are not relevant for our present purpose. They have not been pressed before us.

The election petition came up for trial before Mahajan, J. The learned Judge submitted the following question to a Full Bench for decision :

“Whether allegation in para. 4 (a) pertaining to the vote of Hari Singh is correct and the vote was void and was polled in favour of respondent No. 1 in violation of the Rules and has materially affected the result of the election of respondent No. 1”.

The Full Bench by majority came to the conclusion that the vote of Hari Singh was void as his name was included in the electoral roll of the constituency after the last date for making nominations for the election in that constituency. Thereafter the case was sent back to Mahajan, J., for deciding the issues left undecided. On the basis of the opinion expressed by the Full Bench, the learned Judge came to the conclusion that the votes of Hari Singh, Harjinder Singh and Balwant Singh were void votes. Consequently he recounted the votes validly cast and came to the conclusion that the 1st respondent had been duly elected. He gave a declaration to that effect.

As seen earlier, the main contention in this appeal relates to the true effect of sub-section (3) of section 23 of the Representation of People Act, 1950 (to be hereinafter referred to as "the 1950 Act") which prohibits the deletion of any entry or inclusion of any name in the electoral roll of a constituency after the last date for making nominations for an election in that constituency and before the completion of that election. We have considered the scope of that provision in *Baidyarath Panjari v. Siteram Mehta and others*¹, in which we have delivered judgment just now. In view of that decision, the view taken by the majority of the Full Bench must be held to be correct.

Evidently under an erroneous impression that Harjinder Singh and Balwant Singh had voted against him, the appellant had contended in his recriminatory petition that their votes were invalid. But on scrutiny it was found that one of them had given his first preference to him. Now it is contended on his behalf that as the 1st respondent had not challenged the validity of those votes, the trial Court could not have excluded from consideration the vote cast in his favour by one of those persons. This is an untenable contention. The votes of Harjinder Singh and Balwant Singh have been rejected on the ground that their names were included in the electoral roll in defiance of the mandate given under section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act. What applies to Hari Singh equally applies to Harjinder Singh and Balwant Singh. The fact that the 1st respondent did not challenge the validity of those votes is immaterial in the circumstances of this case. The election petition and recriminatory petition were parts of one enquiry. As the validity of these three votes had come up for consideration and as it has been held that those votes are void votes, it necessarily follows that those votes must be excluded from consideration in determining the result of the election.

Another contention urged by Shri Hardev Singh is that only the votes of those electors who had applied for the inclusion of their names in the electoral roll after the period mentioned in section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act can be held to be void; as the person who cast his vote in favour of the appellant had applied for inclusion of his name some days before the last date for making nominations, the inclusion of his name in the roll after that date will not make his vote void. In support of his contention, he placed reliance on the decision of the Patna High Court in *Ramswaroop Prasad Tadas v. Jaga Kishore Prasad Narain Singh*². The ratio of that decision has no application to the facts of the present case. That decision was rendered before sub-section (3) of section 23 of the 1950 Act was incorporated into the 1950 Act. The mandate of that provision is plain and unambiguous. It prohibits inclusion of any name in the electoral roll after the prescribed date whether the application for inclusion was made before or after that date.

The only other contention that remains to be considered is that the High Court should have held that the vote of Tarsem Singh is invalid. It is not disputed that Tarsem Singh's name finds place in the electoral roll of the constituency but the argument was that as he had taken up Government service subsequent to the inclusion of his name in the electoral roll, he became disqualified to be a member of any local board and therefore he was not entitled to vote in the election. This contention cannot be upheld. Section 62 of the Act provides thus :

"62. (1) No person who is not, and except as expressly provided by this Act, every person who is, for the time being entered in the electoral roll of any constituency shall be entitled to vote in that constituency.

(2) No person shall vote at an election in any constituency if he is subject to any of the disqualifications referred to in section 16 of the Representation of the People Act, 1950.

1. A.I.R. 1970 S.C. 314.

2. (1958-59) 17 F.L.R. 110.

(3) No person shall vote at a general election in more than one constituency of the same class, and if a person votes in more than one such constituency, his votes in all such constituencies shall be void.

(4) No person shall at any election vote in the same constituency more than once, notwithstanding that his name may have been registered in the electoral roll for that constituency more than once, and if he does so vote, all his votes in that constituency shall be void.

(5) No person shall vote at any election if he is confined in a prison, whether under a sentence of imprisonment or transportation or otherwise, or is in the lawful custody of the police :

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall apply to a person subjected to preventive detention under any law for the time being in force."

In view of those provisions read with section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act every person who is for the time being entered in the electoral roll of a constituency as it stood on the last date for making nominations for an election in that constituency is entitled to vote unless it is shown that he is prohibited by any of the provisions of the Act from exercising his vote. The prohibitions contained in sub-sections 3, 4 and 5 of section 62 of the Act do not apply to the case of Tarsem Singh. Therefore we have to see whether the prohibition contained in sub-section (2) applies to his case. That sub-section says that no person shall vote at an election in any constituency if he is subject to any of the disqualifications referred to in section 16 of the 1950 Act.

This takes us to section 16 of the 1950 Act. It reads thus :

" 16 (1) A person shall be disqualified for registration in an electoral roll if he—

(a) is not a citizen of India ; or

(b) is of unsound mind and stands so declared by a competent Court ; or

(c) is for the time being disqualified from voting under the provisions of any law relating to corrupt practices and other offences in connection with elections.

(2) The name of any person who becomes so disqualified after registration shall forthwith be struck off the electoral roll in which it is included :

Provided that the name of any person struck off the electoral roll of a constituency by reason of a disqualification under clause (c) of sub-section (1) shall forthwith be re-instated in that roll if such disqualification is, during the period such roll is in force, removed under any law authorizing such removal".

It is not the case of the appellant that Tarsem Singh had incurred any of the disqualifications mentioned therein. No other provision of law in the Act or in any other law was brought to our notice disqualifying him from exercising his vote. The right to vote being purely a statutory right, the validity of any vote has to be examined on the basis of the provisions of the Act. We cannot travel outside those provisions to find out whether a particular vote was a valid vote or not. In view of section 30 of the 1950 Act, civil Courts have no jurisdiction to entertain or adjudicate upon any question whether any person is or is not entitled to register himself in the electoral roll in a constituency or to question the illegality of the action taken by or under the authority of the electoral registration officer or any decision given by any authority appointed under that Act for the revision of any such roll. Part III of the 1950 Act deals with the preparation of rolls in a constituency. The provisions contained therein prescribe the qualifications for being registered as a voter (section 19), disqualifications which disentitle a person from being registered as a voter (section 16), revision of the rolls (section 21), correction of entries in the electoral rolls (section 22) inclusion of the names in the electoral rolls (section 23), appeals against orders passed by the concerned authorities under sections 22 and 23 (section 24). Sections 14 to 24 of the 1950 Act are integrated provisions. They form a complete code by themselves in the matter of preparation and maintenance of electoral rolls. It is clear from those provisions that the entries found in the electoral roll are final and they are not open to challenge either before a civil Court or before a tribunal which considers the validity of any election. In *B. M. Ramaswamy v. B. M. Krishnamurthy and others*¹, this Court came to the conclusion that the finality of the electoral roll cannot be challenged in a proceeding challenging the validity of the election.

For the reasons mentioned above this appeal fails and the same is dismissed with costs.

State of Punjab

Essential Commodities Act (X of 1955), section 8—“Attempt to contravene....any order made under section 3”—What is—Distinction between attempt and preparation.

As a matter of law a preparation for committing an offence is different from attempt to commit it. The preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence. On the other hand an attempt to commit an offence is a direct movement towards the commission after preparations are made. The test for determining whether an act constitutes an attempt or preparation is whether the overt acts already done are such that if the offender changes his mind and does not proceed further in its progress, the acts already done would be completely harmless.

On the facts found in the present case, there was no attempt on the part of the appellants to commit the offence of export of paddy contrary to the provisions of Punjab Paddy (Export Control) Order, 1959. It was merely a preparation. It is true that the appellants had no permit to carry the paddy, which they had on the lorry, outside the State limits, but it is quite possible that they might have changed their mind before crossing the State border.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and Order dated the 4th November, 1965 of the Punjab High Court in Criminal Revision No. 263 of 1965 and Criminal Misc. No. 224 of 1965.

Pritam Singh Safer, for Appellants.

Harbans Singh and R. N. Sachthy, for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ramaswami, J.—This appeal is brought, by Special Leave, from the judgment of the Punjab High Court, dated 4th November, 1965 by which Criminal Revision Petition No. 263 of 1965 and Criminal Miscellaneous case No. 224 of 1965 were dismissed.

The case of the prosecution is that on 19th October, 1961 Sub-Inspector, Banarsi Lal of Food and Supplies Department was present at Samalkha Barrier along with Head Constable Badan Singh and others. The appellant Malkiat Singh then came driving truck No. PNU 967. Babu Singh was the cleaner of that truck. The truck carried 75 bags of paddy weighing about 140 maunds. As the export of paddy was contrary to law, the Sub-Inspector took into possession the truck as also the bags of paddy. It is alleged that the consignment of paddy was booked from Malerkotla on 18th October, 1961 by Qimat Rai on behalf of Messrs. Sawan Ram Chiranji Lal. The consignee of the paddy was Messrs. Devi Dayal Brij Lal of Delhi. It is alleged that Qimat Rai also gave a letter, Exhibit P-3 addressed to the consignee, Sawan Ram and Chiranji Lal were partners of Messrs. Sawan Ram Chiranji Lal and they were also prosecuted. In the trial Court Malkiat Singh, admitted that he was driving the truck which was loaded with 75 bags of paddy and the truck was intercepted at Samalkha Barrier. According to Malkiat Singh, he was given the paddy by the Transport Company at Malerkotla for being transported to Delhi. The Transport Company also gave him a letter assuring him that it was an authority for transporting the paddy. But it later transpired that it was a personal letter from Qimat Rai to the Commission agents at Delhi and that it was not a letter of authority. Babu Singh admitted that he was sitting in the truck as a cleaner. The trial Court convicted all the accused persons, but on appeal the Additional Sessions Judge set aside the conviction of Sawan Ram and Chiranji Lal and affirmed the conviction of Qimat Rai and of the two appellants. The appellants took the matter in revision to the High Court but the revision petition was dismissed on 4th November, 1964.

It is necessary at this stage to reproduce the relevant provisions of the Essential Commodities Act, 1955 (X of 1955). Section 3 (1) is to the following effect:

“3. (1) If the Central Government is of opinion that it is necessary or expedient so to do for maintaining or increasing supplies of any essential commodity or for securing their equitable distribution and availability at fair prices, it may, by order, provide for regulating or prohibiting the production, supply and distribution thereof and trade and commerce therein.”

Section 7 States :

“7. (1) If any person contravenes any order made under section 3—

(a) he shall be punishable—

(i) in the case of an order made with reference to clause (h) or clause (i) of sub-section (2) of the section, with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year and shall also be liable to fine, and

(ii) in the case of any other order, with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years and shall also be liable to fine :

Provided that if the Court is of opinion that a sentence of fine only will meet the ends of justice, it may, for reasons to be recorded, refrain from imposing a sentence of imprisonment ; and

(b) any property in respect of which the order has been contravened or such part thereof as the Court may deem fit including, in the case of an order relating to foodgrains, any packages, coverings or receptacles in which they are found and any animal, vehicle, vessel or other conveyance used in carrying foodgrains shall be forfeited to the Government :

Provided that if the Court is of opinion that it is not necessary to direct forfeiture in respect of the whole or, as the case may be, any part of the property or any packages, coverings or receptacles or any animal, vehicle, vessel or other conveyance, it may, for reason to be recorded, refrain from doing so.

(2) If any person to whom a direction is given under clause (b) of sub-section (4) of section 3 fails to comply with the direction he shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.”

By section 2 of Punjab Act XXXIV of 1950 the Punjab Legislature added a new section, section 7-A in the Central Act No. X of 1955 which reads as follows :

“Forfeiture of certain property used in the commission of the offence.—Whenever any offence relating to foodstuffs which is punishable under section 7 has been committed, the Court shall direct that all the packages, coverings or receptacles in which any property liable to be forfeited under the said section is found and all the animals, vehicles, vessels or other conveyances used in carrying the said property shall be forfeited to the Government."

On 3rd January, 1959 the Central Government promulgated the Punjab Paddy (Export Control) Order, 1959 in exercise of the powers conferred by section 3 of the Essential Commodities Act, 1955. Para 2 of this Order states :

"2. Definitions.—In this Order, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) 'export' means to take or cause to be taken out of any place within the State of Punjab to any place outside the State.

(b) 'paddy' means rice in husk ;

(c) 'State Government' means the Government of the State of Punjab."

Para. 3 of the Order provides as follows :

"Restrictions on export of paddy.—No person shall export or attempt to export or abet the export of paddy except under and in accordance with a permit issued by the State Government or any officer authorised by the State Government in this behalf :

Provided that nothing contained herein shall apply to the export of paddy,—

(i) not exceeding five seers in weight by a bona fide traveller as part of his luggage ; or

(ii) on Government account ; or

(iii) under and in accordance with Military Credit Notes."

The question to be considered in this appeal is whether upon the facts found by the lower Courts any offence has been committed by the appellants. It is not disputed that the truck carrying the paddy was stopped at Samalkha Barrier which is 32 miles from Delhi. It is also not disputed that the Delhi-Punjab boundary was, at the relevant point of time, at about the 18th mile from Delhi. It is therefore evident that there has been no export of paddy outside the State of Punjab in this case. The truck with the loaded paddy was seized at Samalkha well inside the Punjab boundary. It follows therefore that there was no export of paddy within the meaning of Para 2 (a) of the Punjab Paddy (Export Control) Order, 1959. It was however argued on behalf of the respondent that there was an attempt on the part of the appellants to transport paddy to Delhi, and so there was an attempt to commit the offence of export. In our opinion, there is no substance in this argument. On the facts found, there was no attempt on the part of the appellants to commit the offence of export. It was merely a preparation on the part of the appellant and as a matter of law a preparation for committing an offence is different from attempt to commit it. The preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence. On the other hand, an attempt to commit the offence is a direct movement towards the commission after preparations are made. In order that a person may be convicted of an attempt to commit a crime, he must be shown first to have had an intention to commit the offence, and secondly to have done an act which constitutes the actus reus of a criminal attempt. The sufficiency of the actus reus is a question of law which had led to difficulty because of the necessity of distinguishing between acts which are merely preparatory to the commission of a crime, and those which are sufficiently proximate to it to amount to an attempt to commit it. If a man buys a box of matches, he cannot be convicted of attempted arson, however clearly it may be proved that he intended to set fire to a haystack at the time of the purchase. Nor can he be convicted of this offence if he approaches the stack with the matches in his pocket, but if he bends down near the stack and lights a match which he extinguishes on perceiving that he is being watched, he may be guilty of an attempt to burn it. Sir James Stephen, in his Digest of Criminal Law, Article 50, defines an attempt as follows :

"an act done with intent to commit that crime, and forming part of a series of acts which would constitute its actual commission if it were not interrupted. The point at which such a series of acts begins cannot be defined, but depends upon the circumstances of each particular case."

The test for determining whether the act of the appellants constituted an attempt or preparation is whether the overt acts already done are such that if the offender changes his mind and does not proceed further in its progress, the acts already done would be completely harmless. In the present case it is quite possible that the appellants may have been warned that they had no licence to carry the paddy and they may have changed their mind at any place between Samalkha Barrier and the Delhi-Punjab boundary and not have proceeded further in their journey. Section 8 of the Essential Commodities Act States that "any person who attempts to contravene or abets a contravention of, any order made under section 3 shall be deemed to have contravened that order." But there is no provision in the Act which makes a preparation to commit an offence punishable. It follows therefore that the appellants should not have been convicted under section 7 of the Essential Commodities Act.

For these reasons we allow this appeal and set aside the conviction of the appellants under section 7 of the Essential Commodities Act and the sentence of fine imposed upon each of them. We also set aside the conviction and sentence of Qimat Rai and the order of forfeiture passed by the trial Magistrate with regard to 75 bags of paddy and truck No. PNU 967. The fines, if paid by any of the convicted persons must be refunded.

Hindu Law—Hindu undivided family—Temporary reduction of the coparcenary unit to a single individual—Its effect on joint property.

Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, (LXXVIII of 1956), sections 11, 12 and 14—Interpretation—Widow adopting a child—Adopted child, if becomes the son of the deceased husband—Ties of the child in the family of his birth, if become completely severed.

The property which was the joint family property of the Hindu undivided family did not cease to be so because of the "temporary reduction of the coparcenary unit to a single individual". The character of the property, viz., that it was the joint property of a Hindu undivided family, remained the same.

It is clear on a reading of the main part of section 12 and sub-section (vi) of section 11 of the Act (LXXVIII of 1956) that the effect of adoption under the Act is that it brings about severance of all ties of the child given in the family of his or her birth. The child altogether ceases to have any ties with the family of his birth. Correspondingly, these very ties are automatically replaced by those created by adoption in the adoptive family. The legal effect of giving the child in adoption must therefore be to transfer the child from the family of its birth to the family of its adoption. The result is, as mentioned in section 14 (1) namely where a wife is living, the adoption by the husband results in the adoption of the child by both these spouses; the child is not only the child of the adoptive father but also of the adoptive mother. In case of there being two wives, the child becomes the adoptive child of the senior-most wife in marriage, the junior wife becoming the step-mother of the adopted child. Even when a widower or a bachelor adopts a child, and he gets married subsequent to the adoption, his wife becomes the step-mother of the child. When a widow or an unmarried woman adopts a child, any husband she marries subsequent to adoption becomes the step-father of the adopted child. The scheme of sections 11 and 12, therefore, is that in the case of adoption by an widow the adopted child becomes absorbed in the adoptive family to which the widow belonged. In other words the child adopted is tied with the relationship of sonship with the deceased husband of the widow. The other collateral relations of the husband would be connected with the child through that deceased husband of the widow. It is true that section 14 does not expressly state that the child adopted by the widow becomes the adopted son of the husband of the widow. But it is a necessary implication of sections 12 and 14 of the Act that a son adopted by the widow becomes a son not only of the widow but also of the deceased husband. It is for this reason that we find in sub-section (4) of section 14 a provision that where a widow adopts a child and subsequently marries a husband, the husband becomes the "step-father" of the adopted child. It is not correct to say that the rights of the Inamdar's tenants were not heritable under the Madhya Bharat Land Revenue and Tenancy Act, 1950. Because, section 86 which contains provisions with regard to mutation of names, applies to all tenants and contemplates heritability and transferability of the rights of a tenant or sub-tenant.

Ramaswami, J.—This appeal is brought by Special Leave from the judgment of the Madhya Pradesh High Court dated 7th September, 1965 in Second Appeal No. 275 of 1962.

Dulichand and Bhagirath were brothers and the properties concerned are, according to the written statement of the defendant himself, ancestral. Plaintiff Sitabai is the widow of Bhagirath, who predeceased Dulichand, his elder brother sometime in 1930. It is the admitted case of both the parties that after Bhagirath died, the plaintiff Sitabai was living with Dulichand as a result of which connection an illegitimate child defendant Ramchandra was born in 1935. Dulichand died on 13th March, 1958. Sometime before his death Sitabai adopted plaintiff No. 2 Suresh Chandra and an adoption deed was executed on 4th March, 1958. After the death of Dulichand, Ramchandra took possession of the joint family properties. The plaintiff therefore brought the present suit for ejectment of the defendant Ramchandra, the illegitimate son of Dulichand from the disputed properties. The suit was contested by the defendant on the ground that Dulichand had in his lifetime surrendered the lands to the Jagirdar who made re-settlement of the same with the defendant. As regards the house the contention of the defendant was that Dulichand had executed a will before his death making a bequest of his house entirely to him. The trial Court decided all the issues in favour of the plaintiff and granted the plaintiffs a decree for possession with regard to the land and the house. The defendant took the matter in appeal to the District Judge who modified the decree. The District Judge took the view that the will executed by Dulichand was valid so far as half of his share in the house was concerned and, therefore, defendant was entitled to claim half the share of the house in dispute. The defendant preferred a second appeal before the Madhya Pradesh High Court which reversed the decree of the lower Courts and held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief and the suit should be dismissed in its entirety. The High Court held that plaintiff No. 2 became the son of plaintiff No. 1 in 1958 from the date of adoption and did not obtain any coparcenary interest in the joint family properties. The High Court thought that on the date of adoption Dulichand was the sole coparcener and there was nobody else to take a share of his property and plaintiff No. 2 had no concern with the coparcenary property in the hands of Dulichand.

The first question to be considered in this appeal is whether the High Court was right in holding that plaintiff No. 2 Suresh Chandra at the time of his adoption by plaintiff No. 1 did not become a coparcener of Dulichand in the joint family properties. It is the admitted case of both the parties that the properties consisted of agricultural land and a house jointly held by Bhagirath and Dulichand. After the death of Bhagirath, Dulichand became the sole surviving coparcener of the joint family. At the time when plaintiff No. 2 Suresh Chandra was adopted the joint family still continued to exist and the disputed properties retained their character of coparcenary properties. It has been pointed out in *Gowli Buddanna v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Mysore*¹, that under the Hindu system of law a joint family may consist of a single male member and widows of deceased male members and that the property of a joint family did not cease to belong to a joint family merely because the family is represented by a single coparcener who possesses rights which an absolute owner of property may possess. In that case, one Buddappa, his wife, his two unmarried daughters and his unmarried son, Buddanna, were members of a Hindu undivided family. Buddappa died and after his death the question arose whether the income of the properties held by Buddanna as the sole surviving coparcener was assessable as the individual income of Buddanna or as the income of the Hindu undivided family. It was held by this Court that since the property which came into the hands of Buddanna as the sole surviving coparcener was originally joint family property, it did not cease to belong to the joint family and income from it was assessable in the hands of Buddanna as income of the Hindu undivided family. As pointed out by the Judicial Committee in *Attorney-General of Ceylon v. A.R. Arunachalam Chettiar*², it is only by analysing the nature of the rights of the members of the undivided family, both those in being and those yet to be born, that it can be determined whether the family property can properly be described as 'joint property' of the undivided family. In that case one Arunachalam Chettiar and his son constituted a joint family governed by the Mitakshara school of Hindu law. The father and son were domiciled in India and had trading and other interests in India, Ceylon and Far Eastern countries. The undivided son died in 1934 and Arunachalam became the sole surviving coparcener in the Hindu undivided family to which a number of female members belonged. Arunachalam died in 1938, shortly after the Estate Ordinance No. 1 of 1938 came into operation in Ceylon. By section 73 of the Ordinance it was provided that property passing on the death of a member of the Hindu undivided family was exempt from payment of estate duty. On a claim to estate duty in respect of Arunachalam's estate in Ceylon, the Judicial Committee held that Arunachalam was at his death a member of the Hindu undivided family, the same undivided family of which his son, when alive, was a member and of which the continuity was preserved after Arunachalam's death by adoption made by the widows of the family and since the undivided family continued to persist, the property in the hands of Arunachalam as a single coparcener was the property of the Hindu undivided family. The Judicial Committee observe at page 543 of the report :

".....though it may be correct to speak of him as the 'owner', yet it is still correct to describe that which he owns as the joint family property. For his ownership is such that upon the adoption of a son it assumes a different quality ; it is such, too, that female members of the family (whose members may increase) have a right to maintenance out of it and in some circumstances to a charge for maintenance upon it. And these are incidents which arise, notwithstanding his so-called ownership, just because the property has been and has not ceased to be joint family property. Once again their Lordships quote from the judgment of Gratiaen, J : "To my mind it would make a mockery of the undivided family system if this temporary reduction of the coparcenary unit to a single individual were to convert what was previously joint property belonging to an undivided family into the separate property of the surviving coparcener." To this it may be added that it would not appear reasonable to impart to the Legislature the intention to discriminate, so long as the family itself subsists, between property in the hands of a single coparcener and that in the hands of two or more coparceners."

1. (1966) 1 S.C.J. 686 : (1966) 1 I.T.J. 576 : 2. L.R. (1957) A.C. 540.

The basis of the decision was that the property which was the joint family property of the Hindu undivided family did not cease to be so because of the "temporary reduction of the coparcenary unit to a single individual". The character of the property, viz., that it was the joint property of a Hindu undivided family, remained the same. Applying the principle to the present case, after the death of Bhagirath the joint family property continued to retain its character in the hands of Dulichand as the widow of Bhagirath was still alive and continued to enjoy the right of maintenance out of the joint family properties.

The question next arises whether Suresh Chandra, plaintiff No. 2, when he was adopted by Bhagirath's widow he became a coparcener of Dulichand in the Hindu joint family properties. The High Court has taken the view that Suresh Chandra became the son of plaintiff No. 1 with effect from 1958 and plaintiff No. 2 would not become the adopted son of Bhagirath in view of the provisions of the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956 (LXXVIII of 1956). It was argued on behalf of the appellant that the High Court was in error in holding that the necessary consequence of a widow adopting a son under the provisions of Act LXXVIII of 1956 was that the adoptee would be the adopted son of the widow and not of her deceased husband. In our view the argument put forward on behalf of the appellant is well-founded and must be accepted as correct. Section 5 (1) of Act LXXVIII of 1956 states :

"(1) No adoption shall be made after the commencement of this Act by or to a Hindu except in accordance with the provisions contained in this chapter."

Section 6 deals with the requisites of a valid adoption and provides:

"No adoption shall be valid unless—

(i) the person adopting has the capacity, and also the right, to take in adoption ;

(ii) the person giving in adoption has the capacity to do so ;

(iii) the person adopted is capable of being taken in adoption ; and

(iv) the adoption is made in compliance with the other conditions mentioned in this Chapter."

Sections 7 and 8 relate to the capacity of a male Hindu and a female Hindu to take in adoption. Under section 7 any male Hindu who is of sound mind and is not a minor has the capacity to take a son or a daughter in adoption. If he is married, he requires the consent of his wife in connection with the adoption. A person having more than one wife is required to have the consent of all his wives. Under section 8, any female Hindu, who is of sound mind and not a minor is stated to have capacity to take a son or a daughter in adoption. The language of this section shows that all females except a wife have capacity to adopt a son or a daughter. Thus, an unmarried female or a divorcee or a widow has the legal capacity to take a son or a daughter in adoption. Section 11 relates to "other conditions for a valid adoption" Clause (vi) of section 11 states :

"(vi) the child to be adopted must be actually given and taken in adoption by the parents or guardian concerned or under their authority with intent to transfer the child from the family of its birth to the family of its adoption :"

Section 12 enacts :

"An adopted child shall be deemed to be the child of his or her adoptive father or mother for all purposes with effect from the date of the adoption and from such date all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth shall be deemed to be severed and replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family ;

Provided that—

| (b) | * | * | * | * | * |

(c) the adopted child shall not divest any person of any estate which vested in him or her before the adoption."

Section 14 provides :

"(1) Where a Hindu who has a wife living adopts a child, she shall be deemed to be the adoptive mother.

(2) Where an adoption has been made with the consent of more than one wife, the senior most in marriage among them shall be deemed to be the adoptive mother and the others to be step-mothers.

(3) Where a widower or a bachelor adopts any child, any wife whom he subsequently marries shall be deemed to be the step-mother of the adopted child.

(4) Where a widow or an unmarried woman adopts a child, any husband whom she marries subsequently shall be deemed to be the step-father of the adopted child."

It is clear on a reading of the main part of section 12 and sub-section (1) of section 11 that the effect of adoption under the Act is that it brings about severance of all ties of the child given in adoption in the family of his or her birth. The child altogether ceases to have any ties with the family of his birth. Correspondingly, these very ties are automatically replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. The legal effect of giving the child in adoption must therefore be to transfer the child from the family of its birth to the family of its adoption. The result is, as mentioned in section 14 (1) namely where a wife is living, adoption by the husband results in the adoption of the child by both these spouses; the child is not only the child of the adoptive father but also of the adoptive mother. In case of there being two wives, the child becomes the adoptive child of the senior-most wife in marriage, the junior wife becoming the step-mother of the adopted child. Even when a widower or a bachelor adopts a child, and he gets married subsequent to the adoption, his wife becomes the step-mother of the adopted child. When a widow or an unmarried woman adopts a child, any husband she marries subsequent to adoption becomes the step-father of the adopted child. The scheme of sections 11 and 12, therefore, is that in the case of adoption by a widow the adopted child becomes absorbed in the adoptive family to which the widow belonged. In other words the child adopted is tied with the relationship of sonship with the deceased husband of the widow. The other collateral relations of the husband would be connected with the child through that deceased husband of the widow. For instance, the husband's brother would necessarily be the uncle of the adopted child. The daughter of the adoptive mother (and father) would necessarily be the sister of the adopted son, and in this way, the adopted son would become a member of the widow's family, with the ties of relationship with the deceased husband of the widow as his adoptive father. It is true that section 14 of the Act does not expressly state that the child adopted by the widow becomes the adopted son of the husband of the widow. But it is a necessary implication of sections 21 and 14 of the Act that a son adopted by the widow becomes a son not only of the widow but also of the deceased husband. It is for this reason that we find in sub-section (4) of section 14 a provision that where a widow adopts a child and subsequently marries a husband, the husband becomes the "step-father" of the adopted child. The true affect and interpretation of sections 11 and 12 of Act No. LXXVIII of 1956 therefore is that when either of the spouses adopts a child, all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth become completely severed and these are all replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. In other words the result of adoption by either spouse is that the adoptive child becomes the child of both the spouses. This view is borne out by the decision of the Bombay High Court in

In support of his contention that the present suit is not maintainable, the appellant relies on the following observations of Hegde, J.—

“When the Commissioner sets aside the order passed by the District Magistrate granting permission to file a suit for ejecting a tenant, the order of the Commissioner prevails. If he cancels the permission granted by the District Magistrate there is no effective permission left and the suit instituted by the plaintiff without awaiting his decision must be treated as one filed without any valid permission by the District Magistrate.”

Having regard to these observations the present suit though validly instituted after obtaining the permission under section 3 (1) became incompetent when the permission was revoked by the Commissioner under section 3 (3). But the order under section 3 (3) itself was set aside by the State Government under section 7-F during the pendency of the suit. The question is what is the effect of this order under section 7-F. Now, section 3 (4) provides that the order of the Commissioner under section 3 (3) is subject to an order passed by the State Government under section 7-F. If the State Government acting under section 7-F sets aside the order of the Commissioner revoking the permission, the order under section 3 (1) granting permission is revived. The result is that there is an effective permission to institute the suit under section 3 (1) and the suit is validly instituted.

In *Bhagwan Das's case*¹, the suit was validly instituted after obtaining permission from the Commissioner under section 3 (3). The State Government could not render such a suit incompetent by any order under section 7-F. In the present case the suit was validly instituted after obtaining permission from the Rent Control and Eviction Officer under section 3 (1). The effect of the order of the Commissioner revoking the permission was that the suit became incompetent. The State Government acting under section 7-F had power to revise and set aside the Commissioner's order and restore the permission granted under section 3 (1) so as to make the suit competent.

The order of the State Government after stating that in the interest of justice the house should be available to the landlord for his use, set aside the Commissioner's order under section 3 (3). The result was that the order of the Rent Control and Eviction Officer passed under section 3 (1) stood restored. The further direction in the order that the landlord “is advised to file a suit for eviction from the house in dispute against the opposite party in a civil Court under section 3 of the Act, which will be applicable four months after the date of the order” really means that the permission under section 3 (1) would become effective on the expiry of 4 months. The landlord had thus an effective permission to institute the suit under section 3 (1) on the expiry of four months from 30th March, 1963, that is to say, as from 30th July, 1963. The decree in the suit was passed on 2nd March, 1964. On that date the landlord had a valid permission to institute the suit. The suit was therefore maintainable.

In the result, the appeal is dismissed. There will no order as to costs.

Constitution of India (1950) Article 173—Scope—Requirement as to subscription to an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form—Substantial compliance with—Sufficiency.

The essential requirement of Article 173 (a) of the Constitution as far as material for the present case, is that in order to be qualified to be chosen to fill a seat in the Legislature of a State a person (i) must be a citizen of India and (ii) must make and subscribe before a person duly authorised an oath or affirmation according to the form set out for the purpose in the Third Schedule.

The real purpose of the oath is that the person concerned must give an undertaking to bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution and uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India.

Non-compliance with the provisions of a statute or Constitution will not necessarily render a proceeding invalid if by considering its nature, its design and the consequences which follow from its non-observance one is not led to the conclusion that the Legislature or the Constitution-makers intended that there should be no departure from the strict words used.

In the present case, the essential requirement of Article 173 read with Form VII-A was that the person taking the oath or making the affirmation would bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution and uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India. The words which precede this portion are merely descriptive of the person and of his nomination as a candidate. It is reasonable to think that a mere mis-print in the form of the oath or a mere inaccuracy in rendering the expression "Legislative Assembly" in Gujarati would not be fatal to the election of candidate to Legislative Assembly, if otherwise valid.

Appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 from the Judgment and Order dated the 17th and 18th January, 1968 of the Gujarat High Court in Election Petition No. 2 of 1967.

Mrs. Shyamla Pappu, M.K. Ramamurthi and Vineet Kumar, Advocates for Appellant.

Bishan Narain, Senior Advocate (D.N. Misra, Advocate for Messrs. J.B. Dadachanji and Co., with him) for Respondent No. 1.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Mitter, J.—The only question raised in this appeal from a judgment and order of the High Court of Gujarat dismissing an election petition is, whether the returned candidate was not qualified to be chosen to fill a seat of the State Legislative Assembly inasmuch as he did not subscribe to an oath or affirmation according to the form set out for the purpose in the Third Schedule to the Constitution as prescribed under Article 173 thereof.

The relevant facts may be stated as follows : The notification of the Governor of Gujarat under section 15 (2) of the Representation of the People Act of 1951 for the purpose of election to the Gujarat State Legislative Assembly was issued on 13th January, 1967. Nomination papers were filed by several persons including the returned candidate and the scrutiny thereof was made on 21st January, 1967. The poll took place on 18th February, 1967 and the result declared on 27th February, 1967 showing the returned candidate winning comfortably by a margin exceeding 3,800 votes over his nearest rival. One of the grounds taken in the election petition was that immediately after the scrutiny of the nomination papers, the third respondent to the election petition has filed a written objection before the Returning Officer contending that the returned candidate had not taken oath properly and on the same ground he along with respondents 2 and 4 were not qualified to be chosen and their nomination papers should be rejected. This contention was turned down by the Returning Officer and was also negatived by learned Judge who heard the election petition and in this appeal the unsuccessful petitioner has only pressed this ground.

The relevant portion of Article 173 of the Constitution reads as follows :—

“ A person shall not be qualified to be chosen to fill a seat in the Legislature of a State unless he.....

(a) is a citizen of India, and makes and subscribes before some person authorised in that behalf by the Election Commission an oath or affirmation according to the form set out for the purpose in the Third Schedule ;

(b) and (c) * * * *

The Third Schedule contains various forms of oath or affirmation. Form VII-A, the relevant form for the present purpose is, as follows :

“ Form of oath or affirmation to be made by a candidate for election to the Legislature of State :—

“ I, A.B., having been nominated as a candidate to fill a seat in the Legislative Assembly (or Legislative Council), do swear in the name of God that I will solemnly affirm bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India as by law established and that I will uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India.”

The returned candidate had filed three nomination papers with three different proposers on 20th January, 1967. Each of the three nomination papers clearly mentioned that he was a candidate for election to fill a seat in the Vidhan Sabha for the Gujarat State, i.e., Legislative Assembly of the State. The nomination paper of the returned candidate contained a form of oath or affirmation which was both in Gujarati as well as in English. The English form followed word for word Form No. VII as set out in the Third Schedule, to the Constitution and the Gujarati form purported to set out the Gujarati translation of the form of oath or affirmation. The relevant difference for the purpose of this appeal between the two forms lay in this that the words “ Legislative Assembly ” in the form in English were translated in Gujarati form as “ Rajya Sabha ” and the appellant’s contention before the High Court and before us rested solely on the use of this word which according to learned Counsel went to show that the oath that was taken was for the purposes of filling a seat not in the Legislative Assembly of the State but in the Legislative Council of the State. At the hearing of the petition before the High Court the returned candidate gave evidence to the effect that he had taken the oath not according to the words in the Gujarati form but according to the translation of the words in the English form rendered by the Returning Officer. The Returning Officer was merely called to produce some documents but he was not put on oath nor was he asked any question to corroborate the testimony of the returned candidate. The High Court did not accept this testimony and we see no reason to come to any different conclusion.

We must therefore proceed on the basis that the returned candidate took the oath according to the words of the Gujarati form. It was argued before us that ‘ Rajya Sabha ’ means the Legislative Council of the State and not the Legislative Assembly of the State and consequently the oath taken did not fulfil the requirements of Article 173 (c) of the Constitution. We were not referred to any official translation of the expression “ Legislative Assembly ” in Gujarati. The word “ sabha ” means a gathering or a meeting or an assembly of persons for a definite purpose. Giving the word “ sabha ” the said meaning in the expression ‘ Rajya Sabha ’ it would not be possible to hold that the oath was not in compliance with the form prescribed in Article 173 (c) of the Constitution. No doubt by common parlance in many of the States in Northern India the expression 'Rajya Sabha' has come to mean the Legislative Council of a State while the State Legislative Assembly is generally known as Rajya Vidhan Sabha. But in the absence of any authoritative translation of the expression "State Legislative Assembly" in Gujarati we cannot guide ourselves by the popular rendering of the expression. In this connection it is necessary to mention that in the State of Gujarat there is no Legislative Council of the State. The Legislature consists of one house only, namely, the State Legislative Assembly. There could therefore be no misapprehension either in the person taking the oath or in the Returning Officer when he was accepting the nomination paper with the oath in Gujarati form that the candidate who afterwards won the election was being nominated as a candidate to fill a seat in the Legislative Council of the State and not in the Legislative Assembly.

The High Court held that there was substantial compliance with the requirements of Article 173 (a) of the Constitution in the circumstances surrounding the making and the subscribing of the oath even if the compliance was not literal. We are in full agreement with that view. The essential requirement of Article 173 (a) of the Constitution for our present purpose is that in order to be qualified to be chosen to fill a seat in the Legislature of a State, a person (i) must be a citizen of India and (ii) must make and subscribe before a person duly authorised an oath or affirmation according to the form set out for the purpose in the Third Schedule. Form VII-A contains the following essential requirements :

(1) The person taking the oath or making the affirmation must have been nominated as a candidate to fill a seat in the Legislative Assembly or Legislative Council ;

(2) that he will bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India as by law established ; and

(3) that he will uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India.

The vital requirements, therefore, are (a) the securing of a nomination, and (b) declaration of bearing true faith and allegiance to the Constitution and promise to uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India. The securing of a nomination precedes the making of a declaration. The real purpose of the oath is that the person concerned must give an undertaking to bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution and uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India. This is brought out by the Statement of objects and reasons to the Bill No. 1 of 1963 seeking to amend Articles 19, 84 and 173 of the Constitution. The statement of objects and reasons notes the recommendation of the Committee on National Integration and Regionalism and its view "that every candidate for the membership of a State Legislature or Parliament and every aspirant to, and incumbent of, public office should pledge himself to uphold the Constitution and to preserve the integrity and sovereignty of the Union and that forms of oath in the Third Schedule to the Constitution should be suitably amended for the purpose". The Bill proposed to give effect to the recommendation by amending clauses (2), (3) and (4) of Article 19 as also Articles 84 and 173 and the forms of oath in the Third Schedule. The words in the form of oath in Form VII-A,

"I will uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India" were inserted by the Constitution (Fifteenth Amendment) Act, 1963 giving effect to the view of the said Committee.

As the essential requirements of the oath given in the form in the Third Schedule were not deviated from in the Gujarati form used in this case, we cannot hold that the oath subscribed in this case was not in compliance with Article 173 merely because of the popular meaning of the expression 'Rajya Sabha'.

The real question is, whether the deviation, if any, from the form of oath in English as contained in the Third Schedule is so vital as to lead to the conclusion that no proper oath was taken by the returned candidate. There have been many instances where this Court has held that a substantial compliance with the statute or with the rules framed thereunder is enough even if there be no literal compliance and in our view, there is no reason to adopt a different line of reasoning in the construction and interpretation of the Constitution. In all such cases, one must consider the real purpose of the provision whether statutory or constitutional, to find out whether notwithstanding the apparently mandatory form of the words used any deviation therefrom was to be struck down.

One of the questions which came up for consideration in *Kamaraja Nadar v. Kurju Tharar*¹, was whether the election petition ought to have been rejected merely because the deposit provided for under section 117 of the Representation of the People Act was made in favour of the Election Commission and not in favour of the Secretary to the Election Commission as provided for in the said section. Turning down the argument advanced for rejecting the election petition it was observed :

“What is of the essence of the provision contained in section 117 is that the petitioner should furnish security for the costs of the petition, and should enclose along with the petition a Government Treasury receipt showing that a deposit of one thousand rupees has been made by him either in a Government Treasury or in the Reserve Bank of India, is at the disposal of the Election Commission to be utilised by it in the manner authorised by law.....”

In *Murarka Radhey Shyam Ram Kumar v. Roop Singh Rathore*², one of the points urged against the petitioner was that there was non-compliance with the provisions of section 81 (3) of the Representation of the People Act because the copy of the election petition served on the appellant was not a true copy of the original filed before the Election Commission. Rejecting the said contention it was said :

“.....the word “copy” in sub-section (3) of section 81 does not mean an absolutely exact copy, but means that the copy shall be so true that nobody can by any possibility misunderstand it.”

To the similar effect is the judgment in *Ch. Subbarao v. Member, Election Tribunal Hyderabad*³.

In *State of U.P. v. Manbodhan Lal Srivastava*⁴, one of the contentions urged on behalf of the respondent who was reduced in rank after departmental enquiry, was that the order of the Government was invalid for non-compliance with the provisions of Article 320 (3) (c) of the Constitution which read literally made it obligatory for the Government of India or a Government of a State to consult the Union Public Service Commission or the State Public Service Commission on all disciplinary matters affecting a person in service of the State. In turning down the above it was observed by this Court :

“.....the use of the word “shall” in statute, though generally taken in a mandatory sense, does not necessarily mean that in every case it shall have that effect, that is to say, that unless the words of the statute are punctiliously followed, the proceeding, or the outcome of the proceeding, would be invalid.”

In *State of Punjab v. Satya Pal Dang and State of Punjab v. Dr. Baldev Parkash and others*⁵, one of the points canvassed before this Court was, whether the certificate by the Deputy Speaker on a Money Bill was sufficient compliance with Article 199 (4) of the Constitution which provides that :

“There shall be endorsed on every Money Bill when it is transmitted to the Legislative Council under Article 108, and when it is presented to the Governor for assent under Article 200, the certificate of the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly signed by him that it is a Money Bill.”

It was contended that the provisions of the above clause were mandatory and only the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly could sign the Money Bill. It was pointed out by this Court that the Speaker was not present when the Bills were passed and under Article 180 (2) the Deputy Speaker could act as the Speaker when the latter was absent. This Court proceeded to examine the several tests to determine when the provisions of a statute might be treated as mandatory and when not, and emphasis was laid on one of the distinctions, namely, in cases where strict compliance was necessary to be a condition precedent to the validity of the act itself, the neglect to perform it as indicated was fatal.

The above cases are sufficient to show that non-compliance with the provisions of a statute or Constitution will not necessarily render a proceeding invalid if by considering its nature, its design and the consequences which follow from its non-observance one is not led to the conclusion that the Legislature or the Constitution-makers intended that there should be no departure from the strict words used.

In this case, as we have already noted, the essential requirement of Article 173 read with Form VII-A was that the person taking the oath or making the affirmation would bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution and uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India. The words which precede this portion are merely descriptive of the person and of his nomination as a candidate. It is reasonable to think that a mere mis-print in the form of the oath or a mere inaccuracy in rendering the expression "Legislative Assembly" in Gujarati would not be fatal to the election of candidate, if otherwise valid.

In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1950), section 23 (3)—Amendment of the electoral roll after the last date for making the nomination was over—Validity.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), section 62 (1)—Scope.

Section 23 (3) of the Representation of the People Act, 1950 gives a mandate to the electoral registration officers not to amend, transpose or delete any entry in the electoral roll of a constituency after the last date for making nominations for election in that constituency and before the completion of that election. The legislative mandate like the one embodied in section 23 (3) must be considered as mandatory not merely because of the language employed in that sub-section but also in view of the purpose behind the provision in question.

There is no conflict between sub-section (2) of section 23 and sub-section (2) of section 27. A fair reading of the various clauses in section 27 (2) will make it clear that the entries in an electoral roll of a constituency, as they stood on the last date for making the nominations for an election in that constituency should be considered as final for the purpose of that election.

Section 62 (1) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 no doubt stipulates that every person who is for the time being registered in the electoral roll of any constituency except as expressly provided by the Act shall be entitled to vote in that constituency. But in view of section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act the electoral roll referred to in section 62 (1) of the 1951 Act must be understood to be the electoral roll that was in force on the last day for making the nominations for the election.

Appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 from the Judgment and Order dated the 11th December, 1968 of the Patna High Court in Election Petition No. 4 of 1968.

D. Gobardhan, Advocate for Appellant.

Birendra Prasad Sinha, S.K. Bagga, Hardev Singh and S. Bagga, Advocates for Respondent No. 1.

Hardev Singh, Advocate for Respondents Nos. 2 and 3.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—The principal question raised in this appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of People Act, 1951 (to be hereinafter referred to as the Act) is as to the scope of section 23 (3) of the Representation of People Act, 1950 (to be hereinafter referred to as the 1950 Act). A few subsidiary contentions have also been canvassed. They will be considered at the appropriate stage.

The election petition from which this appeal arises relates to the Darbhanga Local Authorities Constituency of the Bihar Legislative Council. The calendar for the election for that constituency was as follows :

1. Last date for filing nomination papers—2-4-1968.
2. Date of scrutiny of nomination papers—4-4-1968.
3. Last date for withdrawal of candidatures—6-4-1968.
4. Date of poll—28-4-1968.
5. Date of declaration of result—29-4-1968.

Originally five candidates submitted their nominations for the election in question. On scrutiny all of them were held to have been validly nominated. Two of them later withdrew their candidatures within the period prescribed leaving in the field Shri Baidyanath Panjira, the appellant herein, Shri Raj Kumar Mahaseth, respondent No. 2 and Shri Gangadhar, respondent No. 3. There were six polling stations in the constituency. 134 votes were polled out of which 33 votes were polled at Dalsingsarai polling station. Counting of the votes showed that the appellant had secured 45, the second respondent 49 and the third respondent 40, first preference votes. As none of them obtained an absolute majority of the votes cast, the third respondent was eliminated and his second preference votes were taken into consideration. 12 of his second preference votes went to the appellant and 5 to the second respondent. Therefore the appellant was declared elected. His election was later challenged by the 1st respondent herein. The High Court has set aside the election and declared the 2nd respondent elected on the ground that on counting the validly cast votes, the second respondent has secured more votes than the appellant. It held that some of the votes cast were not valid votes.

The controversy relating to the validity of some of the votes polled arose under the following circumstances. In the electoral roll as it stood on the last date of filing nomination papers, the registered voters were only 123; 16 of the registered voters were of the members of Dalsingsarai Notified Area Committee. On 13th April, 1968 as per a notification under section 389 (c) of the Bihar and Orissa Municipal Act, 1922, 40 members were nominated as members to the said Notified Area Committee in place of the old members. Most of them were newly appointed members. To be exact 35 of the 40 members nominated were new members. Thereafter the electoral roll was amended on the 27th April, 1968, just a day prior to the polling. As per the amended electoral roll, there were 39 electors in the Dalsingsarai polling station. Only four of them stood registered in the electoral roll as it stood on 2nd April, 1958. 12 of those who were electors under the original roll were removed from the roll. 33 out of the 39 electors included in the electoral roll relating to Dalsingsarai polling station exercised their franchise during the poll on 28th April, 1968.

The question for consideration is whether it was within the competence of the electoral registration officer to amend the electoral rolls after the last date for making the nomination was over.

Provisions relating to the preparation of electoral rolls for the Legislative Councils' Constituencies are found in Part IV of the 1950 Act. Section 27 (2) of the Act prescribes the mode of preparation of the electoral rolls regarding the local authorities' constituencies of a Legislative Council. Clause (e) of that sub-section stipulates that provisions of sections 15, 16, 18, 22 and 23 shall apply in relation to local authorities constituencies as they apply in relation to assembly constituencies. Section 22 deals with correction of entries in the electoral rolls. Section 23 deals with the inclusion of names in the electoral rolls. Sub-section (3) of that section provides that :

"No amendment, transposition or deletion of any entry shall be made under section 22 and no direction for the inclusion of a name in the electoral roll of a constituency shall be given under this section, after the last date for making nomination for an election in that constituency or in the parliamentary constituency within which that constituency is comprised and before the completion of that election."

The object behind sub-section (3) of section 23 of the 1950 Act would be clear if we examine the scheme of the Act and the principles underlying that scheme. Part III of the 1950 Act provides for the preparation of the electoral rolls for assembly constituencies. Section 15 provides that for every constituency, there shall be an electoral roll which shall be prepared in accordance with the provisions of that Act under the superintendence, direction and control of the Election Commission. Section 16 enumerates what disqualifications will disentitle a person from being enrolled as a voter. Section 18 provides that no person shall be entitled to be registered in the electoral roll for any constituency more than once. Section 18 enunciates the principle "one person-one vote". Section 22 provides for correction of entries in the electoral rolls. Section 23 (1) permits a person whose name is omitted from the rolls to apply for inclusion. Sub-section (2) of section 23 authorises the electoral registration officer to include the name of the applicant in the rolls if he is satisfied that he is entitled to be registered. The object of the aforementioned provision is to see that to the extent possible, all persons qualified to be registered as voters in any particular constituency should be duly registered and to remove from the rolls all those who are not qualified to be registered. Sub-section (3) of section 23 is an important exception to the rules noted earlier. It gives a mandate to the electoral registration officers not to amend, transpose or delete any entry in the electoral roll of a constituency after the last date for making nominations for election in that constituency and before the completion of that election. If there was no such provision, there would have been room for considerable manipulations, particularly when there are only limited number of electors in a constituency. But for that provision, it would have been possible for the concerned authorities so manipulate the electoral rolls as to advance the prospects of a particular candidate. This would be more so if either all or a section of the electors are persons nominated to local authorities. The legislative mandate like the one embodied in section 23 (3) must be considered as mandatory not merely because of the language employed in that sub-section but also in view of the purpose behind the provision in question. In our opinion, section 23 (3) takes away the power of the electoral registration officer or the chief electoral officer to correct the entries in the electoral rolls or to include new names in the electoral rolls of a constituency after the last date for making the nominations for election in that constituency and before the completion of that election. Section 23 (3) does not deal with any mode or procedure in the matter of registering the voters. It interdicts the concerned officers from interfering with the electoral rolls under the prescribed circumstances. It puts a stop to the power conferred on them. Therefore it is not a question of irregular exercise of power but a lack of power.

It was next urged by Mr. Goburdhun, learned Counsel for the appellant that section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act is subject to section 27 (2) of the same Act and therefore in view of the direction issued by the electoral registration officer to include the names of the electors in question, it was not open to the election petitioner to take any objection to the same. We see no substance in this contention. There is no conflict between sub-section (2) of section 23 and sub-section (2) of section 27. In fact, as noticed earlier, the provisions of section 23 have been incorporated into section 27 (2) in view of section 27 (2) (e). A fair reading of the various clauses in section 27 (2) will make it clear that the entries in an electoral roll of a constituency, as they stood on the last date for making the nominations for an election in that constituency should be considered as final for the purpose of that election.

It was next urged that in view of section 62 (1) of the Act, no valid objection can be taken to the franchise exercised by the electors whose names were included in the electoral roll on 27th April, 1968. Section 62 (1) says that "no person who is not, except as expressly provided by this Act, every person who is, for the time being entered in the electoral roll of any constituency shall be entitled to vote in that constituency." That provision no doubt stipulates that every person who is for the time being registered in the electoral roll of any constituency except as expressly provided by the Act shall be entitled to vote in that constituency. The question is which is the electoral roll referred to in that section? Is it the electoral roll that was in force on the last date for making nominations for an election or is it the electoral roll as it stood on the date of the polling? For answering that question we have to go back to section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act. In view of that provision the electoral roll referred to in section 62 (1) of the Act must be understood to be the electoral roll that was in force on the last day for making the nominations for the election.

It was next urged that even if we hold that in including fresh electors in the electoral roll on 27th April, 1968, the electoral registration officer contravened section 23 (3) of the 1950 Act, the same cannot be made a ground for invalidating the election as the contravention in question does not come within the purview of sub-section (1) of section 100 of the Act. This contention again does not appear to be sound. Clause (d) (iii) of sub-section (1) of section 100 of the Act provides that if the High Court is of the opinion that the result of the election in so far as it concerns the returned candidate has been materially affected by the improper reception, refusal or rejection of any vote or the reception of any vote which is void, it shall declare the election void. We have earlier come to the conclusion that the electoral registration officer had no power to include new names in the electoral roll on 27th April, 1968. Therefore votes of the electors whose names were included in the roll on that date must be held to be void votes. That conclusion satisfies one of the conditions prescribed in section 100 (1) (d). We have now to see whether the other conditions prescribed in that clause namely whether the High Court on the material before it could have been of the opinion that the result of the election in far as it concerned the returned candidate has been materially affected because of the reception of the votes which are void. The High Court elaborately considered that question. It has examined each one of the disputed votes and has come to the conclusion that if those votes had been excluded, the valid votes received by the contesting candidates in the first count would have been as follows :

Appellant	.. 32.
Respondent No. 2.	.. 46.
Respondent No. 3.	.. 23.

In the second count after the elimination of the third respondent and taking into consideration the second preferences given by the electors who gave their first preference to him, the following would have been the position :

Appellant	.. 43 votes and
Respondent No. 2.	.. 57 votes.

No material was placed before us to show that this conclusion was wrong. There was some controversy about two votes but we do not think it necessary to go into the same as any decision as regards their validity will not affect the final conclusion.

Before leaving this case, it is necessary to mention that at one stage of the arguments, the learned Counsel for the appellant contended that the decision of this Court in *B. M. Ramaswamy v. B. M. Krishnamurthy and others*¹, governs the facts of this case. But after some discussion he gave up that contention. The ratio of that decision has no relevance for our present purpose. In that case, the High Court came to the conclusion that the corrections in the concerned electoral roll had been made before the last date prescribed for filing nominations to the election but it came to the conclusion that the electors newly added to the list were not qualified to be registered as electors. This Court overruled that finding holding that every person whose name finds place in the electoral roll must be held to be qualified to be a candidate whether he was qualified to be registered as an elector or not. In other words it upheld the finality of the electoral roll as it stood on the last date for filing nominations for the election.

For the reasons mentioned above this appeal fails and the same is dismissed with costs.

Central Excises and Salt Act (I of 1944), sections 2 and 3 and Central Excise Rules (1944), rules 8 and 9—Notifications dated 31st July, 1959 and 30th April, 1960—Exemption from excise duty—Grant of.

Taxing Statutes—Interpretation of.

The notification dated 31st July, 1959 grants exemption to "cotton fabrics produced by any co-operative society formed of owners of cotton powerlooms which is registered or which may be registered on or before 31st March, 1961" subject to four conditions set out in the notification. In the next notification dated 30th April, 1960 exemption was granted to "cotton fabrics produced on powerlooms owned by any co-operative society or owned by or allotted to the members of the society, which is registered or which may be registered on or before 31st March, 1961" subject to the conditions specified in the notification.

Held: Construing those notifications, all that is required for claiming exemption is that the cotton fabrics must be produced on power looms owned by the co-operative society. There is no further requirement under the two notifications that the cotton fabrics must be produced by the co-operative society on the powerlooms "for itself." It is well established that in a taxing statute there is no room for any intendment but regard must be had to the clear meaning of the words. The entire matter is governed wholly by the language of the notification. If the tax-payer is within the plain terms of the exemption it cannot be denied its benefit by calling in aid any supposed intention of the exempting authority. If such intention can be gathered from the construction of the words of the notification or by necessary implication therefrom, the matter is different, but that is not the case here. A statutory notification may not be extended so as to meet a casus omissus.

The operation of the notifications has to be judged not by the object which the rule making authority had in mind but by the words which it has employed to effectuate the legislative intent.

Held, on facts, that the appellant was entitled to exemption from excise duty.

Ramaswami, J.—This appeal is brought by certificate from the judgment of the High Court of Gujarat dated 31st July, 1964 in Special Civil Application No. 1054 of 1963.

The appellant is the sole proprietor of Messrs. Gordhanadas & Co. carrying on business as a dealer in textiles in Bombay. Under an agreement between the appellant on the one hand and the Gandevi Vanat Udhoog Sahkari Mandli Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as the "Society") the Society manufactured cotton fabrics during the period between June, 1959, and September, 1959 and from 1st October, 1959 to 31st January, 1961 for the appellant on certain terms and conditions which were later reduced to writing on 12th October, 1959. Under these terms, the Society agreed to carry out weaving work on behalf of the appellant on payment of weaving charges fixed at 19 nP. per yard which included expenses the Society would have to incur in transporting yarn from Bombay and cotton fabrics woven by the Society to Bombay. The appellant was to supply yarn to be delivered at Bombay to the Society and the Society was to make its own arrangement to bring the yarn to its factory at Gandevi. Clause II provided that the yarn supplied by the appellant, remaining either in stock or in process or in the form of ready made pieces would be in the absolute ownership of the appellant and the Society, as the bailee of the yarn, undertook to take such care of it as it would normally take if the yarn belonged to it. The Society also undertook to have the yarn insured against fire, theft and all other risks including transit risks and further undertook to reimburse the appellant in case it failed to do so. The terms of the agreement though recorded on 12th October, 1959 were to be deemed to be effective as from 21st April, 1959 and the agreement was terminable by either party by giving one month's notice.

The Society was a co-operative society carrying on its work at Gandevi and was registered on or before 31st May, 1961 and consisted of members who owned powerlooms. The Society started the weaving work for the appellant some time in May or June 1959 and supplied to the appellant between 1st June, 1959 and 3rd January, 1961, cotton fabrics measuring 3,19,460 yards. The Society had obtained L-4 licence as required by the Central Excises and Salt Act, 1944 (hereinafter referred to as the 'Act'). By letters dated 29th August 1959 and 27th October, 1961 the Excise Department had granted exemption from excise duty payable on cotton fabrics manufactured by the Society under the notification issued by the Central Government. On 10th November, 1961 the excise authorities issued a notice to the appellant demanding a sum of Rs. 1,69,263.44 payable as excise duty. It was alleged that the duty was payable by the appellant as it had got the goods manufactured through the Society and had got them removed from the Society's factory at Gandevi without payment of duty. On 10th January, 1962 the Superintendent of Central Excise, Bulsar sent another notice to show cause why penalty should not be imposed upon the appellant for contravention of rule 9 and why duty should not be charged for the cotton fabrics so removed by the appellant. The appellant showed cause and on 26th November, 1962 the Assistant Collector of Central Excise and Customs, Surat held that the appellant was liable to pay excise duty to the extent of Rs. 2,20,574.74, being the total amount of basic duty and a penalty of Rs. 350 was levied for contravention of rule 9. The appellant preferred an appeal to the Collector of Central Excise, Baroda but the appeal was dismissed.

Thereafter the appellant moved the High Court of Gujarat for grant of a writ under Article 226 of the Constitution. The High Court dismissed the writ petition by its judgment dated 31st July, 1964 but gave a direction that the respondent was to work out the excise duty on the footing that the appellant was entitled to exemption from duty altogether in respect of goods supplied for the period from 1st June, 1959 to 30th September, 1959. As regards the two other periods i.e., 1st October, 1959 to 30th April, 1960 and from 1st May, 1960 to 31st January, 1961, the High Court dismissed the writ petition and directed the respondent to charge duty at the rate of 29.3 nP. per square meter.

Clause (d) of section 2 of the Act defines "excisable goods" as meaning goods specified in the First Schedule as being subject to a duty of excise. Item 19 in the First Schedule provides for excise duty at different rates depending upon the variety of cotton fabrics. Section 3 which is the charging section, provides for the levy and collection of duties specified in the First Schedule on all excisable goods which are produced or manufactured in India. Rule 8 authorises the Central Government to exempt any excisable goods from the whole or any part of duty payable on such goods. Clause (1) of rule 9 provides that no excisable goods shall be removed from any place where they are produced, cured or manufactured or any premises appurtenant thereto, which may be specified by the Collector in this behalf, whether for consumption, export or manufacture of any other commodity in or outside such place, until the excise duty leviable thereon has been paid at such place and in such manner as is prescribed. Clause (2) of that rule provides that if any excisable goods are, in contravention of sub-rule (1), deposited in, or removed from any place specified therein, producer or manufacturer thereof shall pay the duty leviable on such goods upon written demand made by the proper officer and shall also be liable to a penalty which may extend to two thousand rupees and such goods shall be liable to confiscation. In pursuance of the power under rule 8, the Central Government issued notifications from time to time granting exemptions on cotton fabrics, though such goods were excisable goods under tariff item 19. The first relevant notification is dated 5th January, 1957. By this notification certain classes of cotton fabrics were made exempt from payment of excise duty. Of the items exempted the seventh item is as follows :

"Cotton fabrics manufactured by or on behalf of the same person in one or more factories commonly known as powerlooms (without spinning plants) in which less than 5 powerlooms in all are installed;"

The next relevant notification is notification No. 74 of 1959 dated 31st July, 1959 which reads as follows :

"G.S.R. 899—In pursuance of sub-rule (1) of rule 8 of the Central Excise Rules, 1944, as in force in India and as applied to the State of Pondicherry, the Central Government hereby exempted cotton fabrics produced by any co-operative society formed of owners of cotton powerlooms, which is registered or which may be registered on or before the 31st March, 1961 under any law relating to co-operative societies from the whole of the duty leviable thereon, subject to the following conditions :—

(a) that every member of the co-operative society has been exempt from excise duty for three years immediately preceding the date of his joining such society:

(b) that the total number of cotton powerlooms owned by the co-operative society is not more than four times the number of members forming such society;

(c) that a certificate is produced by each member of the co-operative society from the State Government concerned or such officer as may be nominated by the State Government that he is a bona fide member of the society and that the number of cotton powerlooms in his ownership and actually operated by him does not exceed four and did not exceed four at any time during the three years immediately preceding the date of his joining the society, and that he would have been exempt from excise duty even if he had not joined the co-operative society ;

The Central Government issued another notification dated 30th April, 1960 by which the earlier notification dated 31st July, 1959 was superseded. By this notification the Central Government exempted cotton fabrics produced on powerlooms owned by any co-operative society or owned by or allotted to the members of the society from the whole of the duty leviable thereon subject to the four conditions therein set out. The notification dated 30th April, 1960 is to the following effect.

“ In pursuance of sub-rule (1) of rule 8 of the Central Excise Rules, 1944, as in force in India and as applied to the State of Pondicherry, and in supersession of the Notification of the Government of India Ministry of Finance (Department of Revenue) No. 74 of 1959 Central Excises, dated the 31st July, 1959, the Central Government hereby exempts cotton fabrics produced on powerlooms owned by any co-operative society or owned by or allotted to the members of the society, which is registered or which may be registered on or before the 31st March, 1961 under any law relating to co-operative societies, from the whole of the duty leviable thereon subject to the following conditions :—

(a) that every member of the co-operative society who has been a manufacturer of cotton fabrics on powerlooms, has been exempt from excise duty for three years immediately preceding the date of his joining such society.

(b) that the total number of cotton powerlooms owned by the co-operative society or owned by or allotted to its members is not more than four times the number of members forming such society.

(c) that each member of the co-operative society produces a certificate from the State Government concerned or such officer as may be nominated by the State Government that he is a bona fide member of the society and that the number of cotton powerlooms owned by or allotted to him and actually operated by him does not exceed four and did not exceed four at any time during that three years immediately preceding the date of this joining the society and that he would have been exempt from excise duty even if he had not joined the co-operative society and.....”

The main contention on behalf of the appellant is that the case fell within the language of two notifications dated 31st July, 1959 and 30th April, 1960 and the appellant was entitled to exemption from payment of excise duty on the cotton fabrics. The argument was stressed that the exemption applied to all cotton fabrics which were produced on powerlooms owned by the co-operative society or on powerlooms allotted to its members and it was not a relevant consideration as to who produced or manufactured such fabrics, whether it was the society itself or its members or even outsiders. It was conceded by the appellant that it was the owner of the cotton fabrics. But even upon that assumption the claim of the appellant is that it was entitled to exemption from excise duty as it was covered by the language of the two notifications already referred to. In our opinion, the argument of the appellant is well-founded and must be accepted as correct. The notification dated 31st July, 1959 grants exemption to “ cotton fabrics produced by any co-operative society formed of owners of cotton powerlooms which is registered or which may be registered on or before 31st March, 1961 ” subject to four conditions set out in the notification. In the next notification dated 30th April, 1960 exemption was granted to “ cotton fabrics produced on powerlooms owned by any co-operative society or owned by or allotted to the members of the society, which is registered or which may be registered on or before 31st March, 1961 ” subject to the conditions specified in the notification. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that under the contract between the appellant and the Society there was no relationship of master and servant but the appellant supplied raw material and the contractor i.e., the Society produced the goods. But even on the assumption that the appellant had manufactured the goods by employing hired labour and was therefore a manufacturer, still the appellant was entitled to exemption from excise duty since the case fell within the language of the two notifications dated 31st July, 1959 and 30th April, 1960, and the cotton fabrics were produced on power-looms owned by the co-operative society and there is nothing in the notifications to suggest that the cotton fabrics should be produced by the co-operative society "for itself" and not for a third party before it was entitled to claim exemption from excise duty. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the object of granting exemption was to encourage the formation of co-operative societies which not only produced cotton fabrics but which also consisted of members, not only owning but having actually operated not more than four power-looms during the three years immediately preceding their having joined the society. The policy was that instead of each such member operating his looms on his own, he should combine with others by forming a society which, through the co-operative effort should produce cloth. The intention was that the goods produced for which exemption could be claimed must be goods produced on its own behalf by the society. We are unable to accept the contention put forward on behalf of the respondents as correct. On a true construction of the language of the notifications dated 31st July, 1959 and 30th April, 1960 it is clear that all that is required for claiming exemption is that the cotton fabrics must be produced on power looms owned by the co-operative society. There is no further requirement under the two notifications that the cotton fabrics must be produced by the co-operative society on the powerlooms "for itself". It is well established that in a taxing statute there is no room for any intendment but regard must be had to the clear meaning of the words. The entire matter is governed wholly by the language of the notification. If the taxpayer is within the plain terms of the exemption it cannot be denied its benefit by calling in aid any supposed intention of the exempting authority. If such intention can be gathered from the construction of the words of the notification or by necessary implication therefrom, the matter is different, but that is not the case here. In this connection we may refer to the observations of Lord Watson in *Salomon v. Salomon & Co.*¹:

"Intention of the legislature is a common but very slippery phrase, which, popularly understood may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a Court of Law or Equity, what the Legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication."

It is an application of this principle that a statutory notification may not be extended so as to meet a casus omissus. As appears in the judgment of the Privy Council in *Crawford v. Spooner*²:

".....we cannot aid the legislature's defective phrasing of the Act, we cannot add, and mend, and, by construction, make up deficiencies which are left there."

Learned Counsel for the respondents is possibly right in his submission that the object behind the two notifications is to encourage the actual manufacturers of handloom cloth to switch over to powerlooms by constituting themselves into co-operative societies. But the operation of the notifications has to be judged not by the object which the rule-making authority had in mind but by the words which it has employed to effectuate the legislative intent. Applying this principle we are of opinion that the case of the appellant is covered by the language of the two notifications dated 31st July, 1959 and 30th April, 1960 and the appellant is entitled to exemption from excise duty for the cotton fabrics produced for the period between 1st October, 1959 to 30th April, 1960 and from 1st May, 1960 to 3rd January, 1961. It follows therefore that the appellant is entitled to the grant of a writ in the nature of certiorari to quash the order of the Assistant Collector of Central Excise of Boaroda dated 26th November, 1962 and the appellant order of the Collector of Central Excise dated 12th November, 1963.

1. L.R. (1897) A.C. 22, 38.

2. 6 Moo. P.C.C. 8.

For the reasons expressed we hold that the judgment of the High Court of Gujarat dated 31st July, 1964 should be set aside and that Special Civil Application No. 1054 of 1963 should be allowed and that a writ in the nature of certiorari should be granted to quash the order of the Assistant Collector of Excise and Customs dated 26th November, 1962 and the order of the Collector of Excise dated 12th November, 1963. This appeal is accordingly allowed with costs.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—S. M. SIKRI, R. S. BACHAWAT AND K.S. HEGDE, JJ.

Motibhai Fulabhai Patel & Co.

v.

R. Prasad, Collector of Central Excise, Baroda and others .. Respondents.

Central Excise Rules, (1944), rule 40—Mixture of duty paid tobacco with non-duty paid tobacco—Impossibility of separation of the same—Power of Collector to confiscate the entire mixture—Procedure to be adopted.

It would not be proper, in dealing with a penal provision (relating to forfeiture), for the Court to extend the scope of that provision by reading into it words which are not there and thereby widen the scope of the provision relating to confiscation.

Rule 40 permits the Central Excise authorities to confiscate only those goods on which duty has not been paid. It does not permit them either specifically or by necessary implication to confiscate other goods. Therefore, it was not permissible for the Collector to confiscate the entire tobacco mixture. At the same time no person can be permitted to benefit by his wrongful Act. No rule of law should be so interpreted as to permit or encourage its circumvention. If by a wrongful act of a party he renders it impossible for the authorities to confiscate under rule 40 the non-duty-paid goods it is open to those authorities to confiscate from out of the goods seized, goods of the value reasonably representing the value of the non-paid goods mixed in the goods seized.

The Collector, Central Excise could have confiscated out of the tobacco seized, so much of it as can be held to reasonably represent the value of the tobacco on which the duty had not been paid.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order dated the 13th January, 1964 of the Punjab High Court, Circuit Bench at Delhi in Civil Writ No. 557-D of 1961.

M. P. Vashi, Dilip K. Kapur, S. V. Tambekar and A. G. Ratnaparkhi, Advocates, for Appellant.

D. Narsaraja, Senior Advocate, (R. M. Mehta and S. P. Nayar, Advocates, with him), for Respondents.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—In this appeal by certificate though several contentions were raised in the memo of appeal only two of them were pressed at the time of hearing. They are : (1) under the circumstances of the case the confiscation ordered by the Collector Central Excise is illegal and (2) under any circumstances he could not have confiscated the entire quantity of tobacco used in the mixture.

The appellants are tobacco merchants in Dashrath village near Baroda in Gujarat State. At the relevant time they were holding Central Excise licence in form L-2 and L-5 for the purpose of storing, selling and processing duty paid and nonduty paid tobacco. They had their own duty paid and non-duty paid godowns. In about December, 1958 according to their books they possessed the following lots of different varieties of tobacco.

Variety of tobacco.		Quantity	Rate of duty.
Biri Patti	Bmds.	251.8	1.20 nP. per lb.
Stems Kandi	"	287.20	0.50 -do-
Rava	"	1,326.14	0.50 -do-
Stalk Kandi	"	57.20	0.06 -do-

On 13th December, 1958 the appellants obtained permission from the local Central Excise authorities to mix the above lots of tobacco. The percentage of different varieties of tobacco when mixed would have been as under :

Rava	.. 68.97 per cent.
Stems Kandi	.. 14.86 "
Biri Patti	.. 13.07 "
Stalk Kandi	.. 3.00 "

On 23rd December, 1958 when the process of mixing was still going on the Superintendent of Central Excise, Preventive Headquarters, Baroda and his party raided the duty paid premises of the appellants. There he seized the entire mixture tobacco weighing Mds. 2004.3 srs. i.e., 1,64,834.50 lbs. of tobacco. According to that Superintendent when experiments were conducted he found in the above mixture percentage of different varieties as under :

Rava	.. 44 per cent.
Biri Patti	.. 51.50 per cent.
Stems Kandi	.. 3.74 per cent.

From this he concluded that considerable quantity of non-duty paid Biri Patti tobacco had been utilised in the manufacture of the mixture. Hence notice was issued to the appellants on 6th January, 1959 to show cause why action should not be taken against them under rule 40 of the Central Excise Rules 1944 inasmuch as they brought into duty paid premises 60,770 lbs. of Biri Patti tobacco without payment of duty. It was also alleged in that notice the appellants had removed certain quantity of Rava tobacco from L-2 premises. The appellants submitted their reply on 13th March, 1959. At the hearing before the Collector as the appellants challenged the correctness of the experiments conducted by the Superintendent, Central Excise, the Collector himself in the presence of the appellants conducted a fresh experiment. On the basis of that experiment he came to the conclusion that the results obtained by the experiment conducted by the Superintendent, Central Excise are by and large correct.

By his order dated 13th April, 1959, the Collector, Central Excise held the appellants guilty of contravening rule 40 and consequently levied on them a penalty of Rs. 2,000 as well as the duty payable under law. He also ordered the confiscation of the seized tobacco weighing 1,64,834.50 lbs. But he gave an option to the appellants of redeeming the same on payment of a fine of Rs. 1 lakh. The appellants paid the amount of fine under protest and got the goods released.

Thereafter they moved the High Court of Bombay under Article 226 of the Constitution for quashing the order of the Collector but that application was withdrawn as the appellants first wanted to exhaust their remedy under the Central Excise Act. The appellants unsuccessfully went up in appeal and thereafter in revision under the Central Excise and Salt Act 1944 against the order of the Collector. After the 3rd respondent dismissed their revision petition they filed in the High Court of Punjab at Delhi Civil Writ No. 557-D of 1961 challenging the legality of the order made by the Collector of Central Excise on 13th April, 1959. That petition was dismissed by a Division Bench of that Court on 13th January, 1964. This appeal is brought against that decision.

In this Court the finding of the Collector of Central Excise that the appellants were guilty of mixing the duty-paid tobacco with non-duty-paid tobacco and thereby they contravened rule 40 was not challenged. Nor was there any dispute about the quantity of non-duty paid tobacco used in the mixture. The main contention of Mr. M. P. Vashi, learned Counsel for the appellants was that under rule 40, the Collector could not have confiscated the tobacco mixture as it consisted of both duty paid tobacco as well as tobacco on which duty had not been paid. His alternative contention was that under any circumstances the Collector could not have confiscated anything more than 60,770 lbs. of the mixture which can be said to represent Biri Patti tobacco on which duty had not been paid. In support of his first contention he heavily relied on the decision of K.T. Desai, J., in *Messrs. Valimahomad Gulamhusain Sonavala & Co. v. G.T.A. Pillai*¹.

The seized tobacco mixture weighed 1,64,834.50 lbs. That included 60,770 lbs. of Biri Patti tobacco on which duty had not been paid. But on the remaining quantity duty had been paid. The tobacco seized was found in the godown licenced to store duty paid tobacco. Hence the appellants were clearly guilty of contravening rule 40 of the Central Excise Rules which reads :

“Except as provided in the proviso to sub-rule (1) of rule 32 and in rule 171 no wholesale purchaser of unmanufactured tobacco for the purpose of trade or manufacture and no wholesale purchaser of other unmanufactured products from a curer shall receive into any part of his premises or into his custody or possession, any unmanufactured tobacco or other unmanufactured products other than tobacco or other unmanufactured products imported from a foreign country otherwise than under a valid permit granted by an officer showing that the proper duty has been paid ; and every such wholesale purchaser who receives or has in his custody or possession any such goods, in contravention of this rule shall, in respect of every such offence, be liable to pay the duty leviable on such goods, and to a penalty which may extend to two thousand rupees, and the goods shall also be liable to confiscation.”

In view of this rule the legality of the order made by the Collector in so far as he levied duty as well as penalty cannot be challenged and was not challenged before us. But so far as the confiscation is concerned it was urged that under the rule in question only tobacco on which duty had not been paid could alone have been confiscated. In the instant case even according to the finding of the Collector only on 66,770 lbs. of Biri Patti tobacco the duty had not been paid ; but on the remaining tobacco seized duty had been paid ; it was not possible to separate the duty paid tobacco from the non-duty paid tobacco ; hence it was impermissible for the Collector to confiscate the said tobacco under rule 40, as that rule permitted the confiscation of only non-duty paid tobacco. In *Sonavala's case*¹, referred to earlier Desai, J. had held that the right to confiscate smuggled goods under section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878 does not carry with it the right to confiscate unsmuggled goods. The words ‘such goods’ appearing in section 167 (8) of the Act cannot be interpreted to mean similar goods. It is not open to the Customs authorities to confiscate similar goods even though they may be of the same quality, bulk and value. The words ‘such goods’ mean the very goods which have been smuggled. If the smuggled goods lose their identity, it would not be open to the Customs Officer to confiscate any part of those goods. Where, therefore, gold that has been smuggled has in the melting process got so mixed up with gold that is unsmuggled that it is impossible to separate the smuggled gold from the unsmuggled one, the right to confiscate smuggled gold ceases when the two get inextricably mixed up. The broad proposition laid down by Desai, J., undoubtedly supports the contention advanced on behalf of the appellants. We shall presently show that this statement of the law is not correct but it is necessary to mention at this juncture that in the *Sonavala's case*¹ an innocent third party had purchased the smuggled gold for proper value and mixed the same with unsmuggled gold, which circumstance had an important bearing on the decision of the case.

In Institutes of Justinian at page 104 dealing with the topic commixtio it is observed :

"If the things mixed, still remaining the property of their former owners, were easy to separate against, as for instance, cattle united in one herd, when one owner brought his claim by vindictio his property was restored to him without difficulty but if there was difficulty in separating the materials from each other, as in dividing the grains of wheat in a heap, the obvious mode would be to distribute the whole heap in shares proportionate to the quantity of wheat belonging to the respective owners. But it might happen that the wheat mixed together was not all of the same quality, and therefore the owner of the better kind of wheat would lose by having a share determined in amount only by the quantity of his wheat; and the judge therefore was permitted to exercise his judgment how great an addition ought to be made to his share to compensate for the superior quality of the wheat originally belonging to him."

In Williams on Personal Property (18th Edn.) at page 50, it is observed :

"The acquisition of ownership by accession or confusion of substances also pre-supposes a previous title. Thus the young of a domestic animal belong to the owner of the mother. If any substances, for instances tallow belonging to various owners be mixed by consent or accidentally, the mass appears to belong to the owners of parts in common. And if the confusion be made wilfully by one without the other's leave, the mass belongs to the latter, whose ownership is thus unlawfully invaded."

Dealing with the same topic it is observed in Halsbury's Laws of England 3rd Edn. (Vol. 29) at page 378.

"Ownership of goods may be acquired by confusion or intermixture, if the goods, when mixed, are indistinguishable. If the goods are mixed by agreement or consent the proprietors have an interest in common in proportion to their respective shares; if mixed by accident or the act of a third party, for which neither owner is responsible, the proprietors become owners in common of the mixed property in proportion to the amounts contributed. Where, however, one man wilfully mixes his goods with those of another without the approbation or knowledge of the other, the whole belongs to the latter."

The law on this topic was stated by Bovill, C.J., as early as 1868 in *Spence and another v. The Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd.*¹, thus :

"In our own law there are not many authorities to be found upon this subject but, as far as they go, they are in favour of the view, that, when goods of different owners become by accident so mixed together as to be undistinguishable, the owners of the goods so mixed become tenants in common of the whole, in the proportions which they have severally contributed to it. The passage cited from the judgment of Blackburn, J., in the case of the tallow which was melted and flowed into the sewers, is to that effect : *Buckley v. Gross*². And a similar view was adopted by Lord Abinger in the case of the mixture of oil by leakage on board ship in *Jones v. Moore*³.

"It has been long settled in our law, that, where goods are mixed so as to become undistinguishable, by the wrongful act or default of one owner, he cannot recover, and will not be entitled to his proportion, or any part of the property, from the other owner, but no authority has been cited to shew that any such principle has ever been applied, nor indeed could it be applied, to the case of an accidental mixing of the goods of the two owners; and there is no authority nor sound reason for saying that the goods of several persons which are accidentally mixed together thereby absolutely cease to be the property of their several owners, and become bona vacantia."

The same principle was again reiterated by the House of Lords in *Smarthwaite and others v. Hannay and others*⁴.

The rules enunciated above are of assistance in finding out a solution to the problem before us though they do not govern the same. In the instant case there is no doubt that the appellants were guilty of an unlawful act in mixing duty paid tobacco with the non-duty paid tobacco but the fact remains that they were the owners of both those lots at the time they mixed them and hence the legal principles set out earlier do not cover such a case. It must also be remembered that in dealing with a provision, relating to forfeiture we are dealing with a penal provision. It would not be proper for us to extend the scope of that provision by reading into it words which are not there and thereby widen the scope of the provision relating to confiscation. Rule 40 permits the Central Excise Authorities to confiscate only those goods on which duty has not been paid. It does not permit them either specifically or by necessary implication to confiscate other goods. Therefore it was not permissible for the Collector to confiscate the entire tobacco mixture. At the same time no person can be permitted to benefit by his wrongful act. No rule of law should be so interpreted as to permit or encourage its circumvention. If by the wrongful act of a party he renders it impossible for the authorities to confiscate under rule 40 the non-duty paid goods it is in our opinion open to those authorities to confiscate from out of the goods seized, goods of the value reasonably representing the value of the non-duty paid goods mixed in the goods seized. Applying that rule to the facts of this it follows that the Collector, Central Excise could have confiscated out of the tobacco seized, so much of it as can be held to reasonably represent the value of the tobacco on which the duty had not been paid.

As noticed earlier the tobacco confiscated had been returned to the appellants after realising from them a sum of Rs. 1. lac as fine. The Counsel for the parties agreed at the hearing that the value of the Biri Patti tobacco used in the mixture for which no duty had been paid could be fixed at Rs. 35,000. In view of this agreement it is not necessary for us to remit the case back to the Collector of Central Excise for assessing the value of the tobacco on which duty had not been paid. In view of our earlier findings the fine to be levied on the appellants in lieu of the confiscation that could have been ordered has to be fixed at Rs. 35,000. From this it follows that the Collector has to refund to the appellants a sum of Rs. 65,000 which he has collected from them in excess of the aforementioned Rs. 35,000. The appeal is allowed to that extent. In the circumstances of the case we direct the parties to bear their own costs both in this Court as well as before the High Court.

By Majority, (Minority, Ray, J.) expressing no opinion): By a petition praying for a writ against infringement of fundamental rights, except in a case where the petition is for a writ of habeas corpus and probably for infringement of the guarantee under Articles 17, 23 and 24, the petitioner may seek relief in respect of his own rights and not of others. The shareholder of a company, it is true, is not the owner of its assets; he has merely a right to participate in the profits of the company subject to the contract contained in the Articles of Association. But on that account the petition will not fail. A measure, executive or legislative, may impair the rights of the company alone and not of its shareholders; it may impair the rights of the shareholders and not of the company; it may impair the right of the shareholders as well as of the company. Jurisdiction of the Court to grant relief cannot be denied, when by State action the rights of the individual shareholder are impaired, even if that action impairs the rights of the company as well. The test in determining whether the shareholder's right is impaired is not formal. It is essentially qualitative: if the State action impairs the right of the shareholders as well as of the company, the Court will not, concentrating merely upon the technical operation of the action, deny itself jurisdiction to grant relief.

A shareholder, a depositor or a director of a banking company may not, therefore, be entitled to move a petition for infringement of the rights of the company, unless by the action impugned by him, his rights are also infringed.

The present writ petition by the petitioner (who claimed to be a shareholder, director and holder of deposit and current accounts in some of the banks taken over) challenging the validity of the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act, 1969, on the ground that it infringed his rights under Articles 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution, was maintainable.

Query: Determination by the President of the existence of circumstances and the necessity to take immediate action on which the satisfaction under Article 123 of the Constitution of India depends, how far justiciable?

Per Raj, J.:—The interpretation of Article 123 of the Constitution is to be made first on the language of the Article and secondly the context in which that power is reposed in the President. When power is conferred on the President to promulgate Ordinances the satisfaction of the President is subjective for these reasons: The power in Article 123 is vested in the President who is the executive head and the circumstances contemplated in Article 123 are a guide to the President for exercise of such power. Parliament is not in session throughout the year and during the gaps between sessions the legislative power of promulgating ordinances is reposed in the President in cases of urgency and emergency. The President is the sole judge whether he will make the Ordinance. The power under Article 123 relates to policy and to an emergency when immediate action is considered necessary and if an objective test is applied the satisfaction of the President contemplated in Article 123 will be shorn of the power of the President himself and as the President will be acting on the advice of Ministers it may lead to disclosure of facts which under Article 75 (4) are not to be disclosed. For these reasons it must be held that the satisfaction of the President is subjective.

The only way in which the exercise of power by the President can be challenged is by establishing bad faith or mala fide and corrupt motive. Bad faith will destroy any action. Such bad faith will be a matter to be established by a party propounding bad faith. He is not only to allege the same but also to prove it. In the present case there is no allegation of mala fides.

The fact that the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Ordinance, 1969 was passed shortly before the Parliament session began does not show any mala fides.

Legislative competence: By Majority: The argument that the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act (XXII of 1969) is not within the legislative power of the Parliament or that in any event to the extent to which it vests in the corresponding new banks the assets of business other than banking, it trenches upon the authority of the State Legislature and on that account void, is untenable.

It cannot, however be held that Parliament was competent to enact Act XXII of 1969, because the subject matter of the Act is "with respect to" regulation of trading corporations and matters subsidiary and incidental thereto and on that account is covered by Entries 43 and 44 of List I of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India. (For reasons see judgment).

Nor is it covered in its entirety by "Banking" in Entry 45 of List I. The legislative entry in List I is "Banking" and not "Banker" or "Banks". To include within the connotation of the expression "Banking" in Entry 45 List I, power to legislate in respect of all commercial activities which a banker by the custom of bankers or authority of law engages in, would result in re-writing the Constitution. Investment of power to legislate on a designated topic covers all matters incidental to the topic. A legislative entry being expressed in a broad designation indicating contour of plenary power must receive a meaning conducive to the widest amplitude, subject however to limitations inherent in the federal scheme which distributes legislative power between the union and the constituent units. The field of "Banking" cannot be extended to include trading activities which not being incidental to banking encroach upon the substance of the entry "trade and commerce" in Entry 26, List II.

But this does not lend any practical support to the argument that Act XXII of 1969 to the extent it makes provisions in respect of the undertaking of the named banks relating to non-banking business distinct and independent of the banking business, is ultra vires. There is no evidence that the named banks were before 19th July, 1969, carrying on non-banking business distinct and independent of of the banking business, or that the banks held distinct assets for any non-banking business, apart from the assets of the banking business.

Power to legislate for acquisition of property is exercisable only under Entry 42 of List III, and not as an incident of the power to legislate in respect of a specific head of legislation in any of the three lists. Under that entry "property" can be compulsorily acquired. In its normal connotation "property" means the "highest right a man can have to anything, being that right which one has to lands or tenements, goods or chattels which does not depend on another's courtesy : it includes ownership, estates and interests in corporeal things, and also rights such as trade-marks, copy-rights, patents and even rights in personam capable of transfer or transmission, such as debts ; and signifies a beneficial right to or a thing considered as having a money value, especially with reference to transfer or succession, and to their capacity of being injured." The expression "undertaking" in section 4 of Act XXII of 1969 clearly means a going concern with all its rights, liabilities and assets as distinct from various rights and assets which compose it.

Power to legislate for acquisition of "property" in Entry 42, List III therefore includes the power to legislate for acquisition of an undertaking. The expression "property" in Entry 42, List III has a wide connotation and it includes not only assets, but the organisation, liabilities and obligations of a going concern as a unit. A law may therefore, be enacted for compulsory acquisition of an undertaking as defined in section 5 of Act XXII of 1969.

Per Ray, J.: The contention that the word "Banking" in Entry 45 of List I would have the same meaning as the definition of "banking" in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act of 1949 and that therefore Act XXII of 1969 is not, in its entirety, within the legislative competence of "Banking" under Entry 45, List I, is untenable. "Banking" in Entry 45, List I will have the wide meaning—to include all legitimate businesses of a banking company referred to in section 5 (b) as well as in section 6 (1) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949.

The business of a bank will consist not only of the hard core of banking business but also of the diverse kinds of lawful businesses which have grown to be inextricably bound up in the form of chain or string transactions. The word has never had any static meaning and the only meaning will be the common understanding of men and the established practice in relation to banking.

Act XXII of 1969 is a valid piece of legislation under Entries 42 in List III and Entry 45 of List I. It does not trench upon Entry 26 in List II.

The undertaking of a banking company is property which can be acquired under Article 31 (2) of the Constitution.

*Infringement of Articles 19 (1) (f) and (g) :—*By Majority : The contention that Articles 31 (2) and 19 (1) (f) are mutually exclusive and that therefore a law directly providing for acquisition of property for a public purpose cannot be tested for its validity on the plea that it imposes limitations on the right to property which are not reasonable, is untenable.

Under the Constitution protection against impairment of the guarantee of fundamental rights is determined by the nature of the right, the interest of the aggrieved party and the degree of harm resulting from the State action. Impairment of the right of the individual and not the object of the State in taking the impugned action, is the measure of protection. To concentrate merely on power of the State and the object of the State action in exercising that power is therefore to ignore the true intent of the Article. In this Court, there is, however, a body of authority that the nature and extent of the protection of the fundamental rights is measured not by the operation of the State action upon the rights of the individual, but by its object. Thereby the constitutional scheme which makes the guaranteed rights subject to the permissible restrictions within their allotted fields got blurred and gave impetus to a theory that certain Articles of the Constitution enact a code dealing exclusively with matters dealt with therein and the protection which an aggrieved person may claim is circumscribed by the object of the State action. Protection of the right to property or personal freedom is most needed when there is an actual threat. To argue that State action which deprives a person permanently or temporarily of his right to property, or personal freedom operates to extinguish the right or the remedy is to reduce the guarantee to an empty platitude. Again to hold that the extent of, and circumstances in which, the guarantee of protection is available depends upon the object of the State action, is to seriously erode its effectiveness. Examining the problem not merely in semantics but in the broader and more appropriate context of the constitutional scheme which aims at affording the individual the fullest protection of his basic rights and on that foundation to erect a structure of a truly democratic polity, the conclusion is inevitable that the validity of the State action must be adjudged in the light of its operation upon the rights of the individual and groups of individuals in all their dimensions.

Limitations prescribed for ensuring due exercise of the authority of the State to deprive a person of his property and of the power to compulsorily acquire his property are, therefore, specific classes of limitations on the right to property falling within Article 19 (1) (f). Hence it cannot be said that the challenge to the validity of the provision for acquisition is liable to be tested only on the ground of non-compliance with Article 31 (2). Formal compliance with the conditions under Article 31 (2) is not sufficient to negative the protection of the guarantee of the right to property. Acquisition must be under the authority of a law and the expression "law" means a law which is within the competence of the Legislature, and does not impair the guarantee of the rights in Part III. Thus, Articles 19 (1) (f) and 31 (2) are not mutually exclusive.

The assumption in A.K. Gopalan's case, (1950) S.C.R. 88: (1950) S.C.J. 174, that certain Articles in the Constitution exclusively deal with specific matters and in determining whether there is infringement of the individual's guaranteed rights, the object and the form of the State action alone need be considered, and effect of the laws on fundamental rights of the individuals in general will be ignored cannot be accepted as correct.

The area of protection afforded against State action by the freedom under Article 19 (1) (f) and by the exercise of the power of the State to acquire property of the individual without his consent must still be reconciled. If property is compulsorily acquired for a public purpose and the law satisfied the requirements of Articles 31 (2) and 31 (2A), the Court may readily presume that by the acquisition a reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right to hold property is imposed in the interests of the general public. But that is not because the claim to plead infringement of the fundamental right under Article 19 (1) (f) does not avail the owner; it is because the acquisition imposes a permissible restriction on the right of the owner of the property compulsorily acquired.

By virtue of Article 19 (6) (ii) as amended by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, the basic and essential provisions of law which are integrally and essentially connected with the carrying on of a trade by the State will not be exposed to the challenge that they impair the guarantee under Article 19 (1) (g) whether the citizens are excluded completely or partially from carrying on that trade, or the trade is competitive. Imposition of restrictions which are incidental or subsidiary to the carrying on of trade by the State whether to the exclusion of the citizens or not must, however satisfy the test of the main limb.

Hence the law which prohibits after 19th July, 1969, the named banks from carrying on banking business, being a necessary incident of the right assumed by the Union, is not liable to be challenged because of Article 19 (6) (ii) in so far it affects the right to carry on business.

But by the provisions of Act XXII of 1969 the named banks are rendered practically incapable of engaging in any business. A named bank cannot even use its name and the compensation which is to be given will, in the absence of agreement, be determined by the tribunal and paid in securities which will mature not before ten years. The named banks are, however, declared entitled to engage in business other than banking; but they have no assets with which that business may be carried. A business organization deprived of its entire assets and undertaking, its managerial and other staff, its premises, and even its name, even if it has a theoretical right to carry on non-banking business, would not be able to do so, especially when even the fraction of the value of its undertaking made payable to it as compensation, is not made immediately payable to it.

Where restrictions imposed upon the carrying on of a business are so stringent that the business cannot in practice be carried on, the Court will regard the imposition of the restrictions as unreasonable.

If compensation paid is in such a form that it is not immediately available for restarting any business, declaration of the right to carry on business other than banking becomes an empty formality, when the entire undertaking of the named banks is transferred to and vests in the banks together with the premises and the names of the banks, and the named banks are deprived of the services of its administrative and other staff. Under the circumstances, the restriction imposed upon the right of the named banks to carry on 'non-banking' business is plainly unreasonable.

Per Raj, J.: Article 19 (1) (f) does not have any application to acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose under authority of a law which provides for compensation as mentioned in Article 31 (2) for the following reasons. First, the provisions of the Constitution are to be interpreted in a harmonious manner. No provision of the Constitution is superfluous or redundant. It cannot be suggested that acquisition of property for public purpose is not of the same content as acquisition for public interest or in the interest of the public. It will be pedantry to say that acquisition for public purpose is not in the interest of the public. Secondly, the contention that Article 31 (2) will have to be read along with Article 19 (1) (f) for the purpose of deciding the piece of legislation on the anvil of reasonableness of restrictions in the interest of the general public will mean that acquisition or requisition for a public purpose under Article 31 (2) is embraced within Article 19 (5). That would be not only depriving the provisions of the Constitution of harmony but also making Article 31 (2) otiose and a dead letter. By harmonising is meant that each provision is rendered free to operate, with full vigour in its own legitimate field. If acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose has to satisfy again the test of reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public then harmony is repelled and Article 31 (2) becomes a mere repetition and meaningless. It could not be said that when Article 31 (2) was specifically enacted to deal with a case of acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose the framers of the Constitution were not aware that it was a form of public deprivation of property. That is why it is important to note the distinction between deprivation of property under Article 31 (1) which will relate to all kinds of deprivation of property other than acquisition or requisition by the State and Article 31 (2) which deals only with such acquisition or requisition of property.

Thirdly, Article 31 (2) and 31 (2-A) is a self contained code. Finally the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955 indicates in bold relief the separate and distinctive field of law for acquisition and requisition by the State of property for public purpose.

Article 19 (6) in the two limbs and in the two sub-Articles of the second limb deals with separate matters and State monopoly in respect of trade or business is not open to be reviewed in Courts on the ground of reasonableness.

Section 15 (2) of Act XXII of 1969 allows the existing banks to carry on business other than banking. If as a result of acquisition, there is lack of immediate resources to carry on these businesses the Act provides compensation and the existing bank will devise ways and means for carrying on the businesses. Constitutionality of the Act cannot be impeached on the ground of lack of immediate resources to carry on business. It cannot be suggested that after compensation has been provided for, the State will have to provide moneys to enable the existing bank to carry on these businesses. That would be asking for something beyond the limits of the Constitution. If the entire undertaking of a banking company is taken by way of acquisition the assets cannot be separated to distinguish those belonging to banking business from others belonging to "non-banking business" because assets are not divided on any such basis. It would be strange to hold in the teeth of express provisions in Act XXII of 1969 permitting the banks to carry on business other than banking that the same will amount to a prohibition on the bank to carry on those businesses.

Articles 19 (1) (f) and (g) do not at all enter the domain of Article 31 (2) because a legislation for acquisition and requisition of property for public purpose is not required to be tested again on the touchstone of reasonableness of restriction. Such reasonable restriction is inherent and implicit in public purpose. That is why public purpose is dealt with separately in Article 31 (2).

Infringement of Article 14 : By majority.—The fourteen named banks are prohibited from carrying on banking business, a disability for which there is no rational explanation. Banks other than the named banks may carry on banking business in India and abroad; new banks may be floated for carrying on banking business. In this a flagrantly hostile discrimination is practised. Section 15 (2) of the Act which by the clearest implication prohibits the named banks from carrying on banking business is, therefore, liable to be struck down.

Again the named banks are also, though in theory competent, in substance prohibited from carrying on non-banking business. For reasons set out for holding that the restriction is unreasonable it must also be held that the guarantee of equality is impaired by taking over the assets relating the non-banking business.

Per Ray, J.—The object of Act XXII of 1969 is to control the deposit resources for developing national economy and as such the selection of 14 banks having regard to their larger resources, their greater coverage, their managerial and personnel resources and the administrative and organisational factors involved in expansion is both intelligible and related to the object of the Act. Section 15 (2) (d) states that these 14 banks after acquisition are not to carry on any banking business for the obvious reason that these 14 banks are not in the same class as the other Indian banks. Besides, it is also reasonable that the 14 banks should not be permitted to carry on banking business as the corresponding new banks. Therefore the classification of the 14 banks is also a rational and intelligible classification for the purposes of the Act.

There has to be a line of demarcation somewhere and it is reasonable that these 14 banks which are in a class by themselves because of their special features in regard to deposit, credit, administration, organisation should be prohibited from carrying on banking business. These special circumstances are the reasons for classification. This distinction between the 14 banks and others reasonably justified different treatment. An absolute symmetry or an accurate classification is not possible to be achieved in the task of acquisition of undertakings of banking companies.

Infringement of Article 31 (2) : By Majority.—A law providing for acquisition must either fix the amount of compensation or specify the principles on which, and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined and given. It is plain on the terms of Articles 31 (2) that the owner whose property is compulsorily acquired is guaranteed the right to receive compensation and the amount of compensation is either fixed by the law or is determined according to the principles and in the manner specified by the law. The law which does not ensure the guarantee will, except where the grievance only is that the compensation provided by the law is inadequate, be declared void.

Both the lines of thought in Vajravelu Mudaliar's case, (1964) 2 S.C.J. 703 : (1965) 1 S.C.R. 614 and Shantilal Mangaldas's case, (1969) 2 S.C.J. 322 : A.I.R. 1969 S.C. 634, which converge in the ultimate result, support the view that the principle specified by the law for determination of compensation is beyond the pale of challenge, if it is relevant to the determination of compensation and is a recognised principle applicable in the determination of compensation for property compulsorily acquired and the principle is appropriate in determining the value of the class of property sought to be acquired.

On the application of the view expressed in the above two decisions, Act XXII of 1969 is liable to be struck down as it fails to provide to the expropriated banks compensation determined according to relevant principles.

It cannot be held that a principle specified by the Parliament for determining compensation of the property to be acquired is conclusive. If that view be accepted, the Parliament will be invested with a charter of arbitrariness and by abuse of legislative process, the constitutional guarantee of the right to compensation may be severely impaired. The principle specified must be appropriate to the determination of compensation for the particular class of property sought to be acquired.

Compensation to be determined under Act XXII of 1969 is for acquisition of the undertaking, but the Act instead of providing for valuing the entire undertaking as a unit provides for determining the value of some only of the components, which constitute the undertaking and reduced by the liabilities. It also provides different methods of determining compensation in respect of each such component. This method for determination of compensation is prima facie not a method relevant to the determination of compensation for acquisition of the undertaking. Aggregate of the value of components is not necessarily the value of the entirety of a unit of property acquired, especially when the property is a going concern, with an organised business. On that ground alone acquisition of the undertaking is liable to be declared invalid, for it impairs the Constitutional guarantee for payment of compensation for acquisition of property by law.

Even if it be assumed that the aggregate value of the different components will be equal to the value of the undertaking of the named bank as a going concern the principles specified do not give a true recompense to the banks for the loss of the undertaking.

The undertaking of a banking company taken over as a going concern would ordinarily include the goodwill and the value of the unexpired period of long-term leases in the prevailing conditions in urban areas. But goodwill of the banks is not one of the items in the assets in the impugned Act and in clause (f) of Part I of Schedule II though provision is made for including a part of the premium paid in respect of leasehold properties proportionate to the unexpired period, no value of the leasehold interest for the unexpired period is given. The value determined by excluding important components of the undertaking, such as the goodwill and value of the unexpired period of leases, will not be compensation for the undertaking.

The method specified for valuation of lands and buildings is not relevant to determination of compensation and the value determined thereby in certain circumstances is illusory as compensation. By providing a method of valuation of land and buildings which is not relevant the amount determined cannot be regarded as compensation. (For details See Majority judgment).

Determination of compensation to be paid for the acquisition of an undertaking as a unit after awarding compensation for some items which go to make up the undertaking and omitting important items amounts to adopting an irrelevant principle in the determination of the value of the undertaking and does not furnish compensation to the expropriated owner.

Further, under the Act the principle for determination of the aggregate value of liabilities is also irrelevant.

Sections 4, 5 and 6 read with Schedule II of Act XXII of 1969 therefore violate Article 31 (2) of the Constitution. Since section 4, 5 and 6 and Schedule II are not severable for the rest of the Act, the Act must, in its entirety, be declared void.

Per Ray, J.—If the quantum of compensation fixed by the Legislature is not liable to be challenged before the Court on the ground that it is not a just equivalent the principles specified for determination of compensation will also not be open to challenge on the plea that the compensation determined by the application of these principles is not a just equivalent. The right declared by the Constitution guarantees compensation before a person is compulsorily expropriated of the property for public purpose. Principles may be challenged on the ground that they are not relevant to the property acquired or the time of acquisition of the property but not on the plea that the principles are not relevant to the determination of a fair or just equivalent of the property acquired. A challenge to the statute that a principle specified by it does not provide or award a just equivalent will be a clear violation of the Constitutional declaration that inadequacy of compensation provided for is not justicable.

When principles are laid down in a statute for determination of compensation all that the Court will see is whether those principles are relevant for determination of compensation. The relevancy is to compensation and not to adequacy. It cannot be held that when the relevant principle set out is 'ascertained value' the petitioner could yet contend that market value should be the principle. It would really be going into adequacy of compensation by preferring the merits of the principle to those of the other for the oblique purpose of arriving at what is suggested to be just equivalent. It is unthinkable that the Legislature after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act intended that the word "compensation" would mean just equivalent. Therefore, just equivalent cannot be the criterion in finding out whether the principles are relevant to compensation or whether compensation is illusory.

Under Act XXII of 1969 the entire undertaking is the subject-matter of acquisition and compensation is to be paid for the undertaking and not for each of the assets of the undertaking. There is no uniform established principle for valuing an undertaking as a going concern but the usual principle is assets minus liabilities. If it be suggested that no compensation has been provided for any particular asset that will be questioning adequacy of compensation because compensation has been provided for the entire undertaking.

The principles which have been set out in the 1969 Act are relevant to the determination of compensation. It may be that adoption of one principle may confer lesser sum of money than another but that will not be a ground for saying that the principle is not relevant. The criticism that compensation provided by the 1969 Act is illusory is utterly unmeritorious. (For details see dissenting judgment of Ray, J.).

Per Ray, J. (Majority expression no opinion):—There can be retrospective legislation affecting acquisition of property and such retrospective operation and validation of actions with regard to acquisition does not offend Article 31 (2) of the Constitution. Act XXII of 1969 which is retrospective in operation does not violate Article 31 (2) because it speaks of authority of a law without any words of limitation or restriction as to law being in force at the time.

Section 11 of Act XXII of 1969 does not suffer from the vice of excessive delegation. It is explicable that where the Government acquires undertakings of industries, the matters of policy involving public interest or national interest should be left to be decided by the Government. There is nothing unconstitutional in such provisions.

Acquisition of the 14 banks and the prohibition of banking business by the existing banks does not violate Article 301 of the Constitution. Article 305 directly applies to a law relating to banking and all businesses necessarily incidental to it carried on by the State to the complete or partial exclusion of 14 banks. Article 302 can have no application in such a case. An individual cannot complain of violation of Article 301. Article 305 applies in the present case and therefore neither Article 301 nor Article 302 will apply.

The following Judgments of the Court were delivered

Shah, J.—(On behalf of himself and other Judges except Ray, J.)—Rustom Cavasjee Cooper—hereinafter called 'the petitioner'—holds shares in the Central Bank of India Ltd., the Bank of Baroda Ltd., the Union Bank of India Ltd., and the Bank of India Ltd., and has accounts—current and fixed deposit—with those Banks; he is also a director of the Central Bank of India Ltd. By these petitions he claims a declaration that the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Ordinance VIII of 1969 promulgated on 19th July, 1969, and the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act XXII of 1969 which replaced the Ordinance with certain modifications impair his rights guaranteed under Articles 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution, and are on that account invalid.

In India there was till 1949, no comprehensive legislation governing banking business and banking institutions. The Central Legislature enacted the Banking Companies Act X of 1949 (later called "The Banking Regulation Act") to consolidate and amend the law relating to certain matters concerning banking. By section 5 (b) of that Act, "banking" was defined as meaning "the accepting, for the purpose of lending or investment, of deposits of money from the public, repayable on demand or otherwise," and by section 5 (c) a "banking company" meant "any company which transacts the business of banking in India." By section 6 it was enacted that in addition to the business of banking as defined in section 5 (b) a banking company may engage in one or more of the forms of business specified in clauses (a) to (o) of sub-section (1). By sub-section (2) of section 6 banking companies were prohibited from engaging "in any form of business other than those referred to in sub-section (1)." The Act applied to commercial banks, and enacted provisions, amongst others, relating to prohibition of employment of managing agents and restrictions on certain forms of employment; minimum paid-up capital and reserves; regulation of voting rights of shareholders and election of Board of Directors; prohibition of charge on unpaid capital; restriction on payment of dividend; maintenance of a percentage of assets; return of unclaimed deposits; and accounts and balance-sheets. It also enacted provisions authorising the Reserve Bank to issue directions to and for trial of proceedings against the Banks and for speedy disposal of winding up proceedings of Banks.

The Banking Regulation Act was amended by Act LVIII of 1968, to give effect to the policy of "social control" over commercial banks. Act LVIII of 1968 provided for reconstitution of the Boards of Directors of commercial banks with a Chairman who had practical experience of the working of a Bank or financial, economic and business administration, and with a membership not less than 51 per cent. consisting of persons having special knowledge or practical experience in accountancy, agriculture and rural economy, banking co-operation, economics, finance, law and small-scale industry. The Act also provided that no loans shall be granted to any director of the Bank or to any concern in which he is interested as Managing Director, Manager, employee or guarantor or partner or in which he holds substantial interest. The Reserve Bank was invested with power to give directions to commercial banks and to appoint directors or observers in the interest of depositors or proper management of the Banking Companies, or in the interest of Banking policy (which expression was defined by section 5 (ca) as "any policy which is specified from time to time by the Reserve Bank in the interest of the banking system or in the interest of monetary stability or sound economic growth, having due regard to the interests of the depositors, volume of deposits and other resources of the bank and the need for equitable allocation and the efficient use of these deposits and resources."

The Reserve Bank was also invested with power to remove managerial and other personnel from office and to appoint additional directors and to issue directions prohibiting certain activities in relation to Banking Companies. The Central Government was given power to acquire the business of any Bank if it failed repeatedly to comply with any direction issued by the Reserve Bank under certain specific provision in regard to any matter concerning the affairs of the Bank and if acquisition of the Bank was considered necessary in the interest of the depositors or in the interest of the banking policy or for the better provision of credit generally or of credit to any particular section of the community or in a particular area.

During the last two decades the Reserve Bank reorganised the banking structure. A number of units which accounted for a small section of the banking business were amalgamated under directions of the Reserve Bank. The total number of commercial banking institutions was reduced from 566 in 1951 to 89 in 1969—73 scheduled and 16 non-scheduled.

In exercise of the authority conferred by the State Bank of India Act XXI of 1955 the undertaking of the former Imperial Bank of India was taken over by a public corporation controlled by the Central Government. The State Bank took over seven subsidiaries under authority conferred by Act XXXVIII of 1959. There were in June, 1969 14 commercial banks operating in India each having deposits exceeding Rs. 50 crores. The following is an analysis of the commercial banking structure in India in June, 1969:

	No. of Banks.	No. of Offices.	Deposits (in Crores)	Credit (in Crores).

Late in the afternoon of 19th July, 1969 (which was a Saturday) the Vice-President (acting as President) promulgated, in exercise of the power conferred by clause (1) of Article 123 of the Constitution, Ordinance VIII of 1969 transferring to and vesting the undertaking of 14 named commercial banks in corresponding new banks set up under the Ordinance. The long title of the Ordinance read as follows:

"An Ordinance to provide for the acquisition and transfer of the undertakings of certain banking companies in order to serve better the needs of development of the economy in conformity with national policy and objectives and for matters connected therewith or incidental thereto."

By section 2, "banking company" was defined as not including a foreign company within the meaning of section 591 of the Companies Act, 1956. An "existing bank" was defined by section 2 (b) as meaning

"a banking company specified in column 1 of the First Schedule, being a company the deposits of which, as shown in the return as on the last Friday of June, 1969, furnished to the Reserve Bank under section 27 of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, were not less than rupees fifty crores."

In the Schedule to the Act were included the names of fourteen commercial banks.

- (1) The Central Bank of India Ltd.
- (2) The Bank of India Ltd.
- (3) The Punjab National Bank Ltd.
- (4) The Bank of Baroda Ltd.
- (5) The United Commercial Bank Ltd.
- (6) Canara Bank Ltd.
- (7) United Bank of India Ltd.
- (8) Dena Bank Ltd.
- (9) Syndicate Bank Ltd.
- (10) The Union Bank of India Ltd.

- (11) Allahabad Bank Ltd.
- (12) The Indian Bank Ltd.
- (13) The Bank of Maharashtra Ltd.
- (14) The Indian Overseas Bank Ltd.

These banks are hereinafter referred to as the named banks.

A "corresponding new bank" was defined in relation to an existing bank as meaning "the body corporate specified against such bank in column 2 of the First Schedule." By section 2 (g) it was provided that the words and expressions used in the Ordinance and not defined, but defined in the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, had the meaning respectively assigned to them in that Act. Thereby the definitions of "banking" and "banking company" in section 5 (b) and section 5 (c) of the Banking Regulation Act were incorporated in the Ordinance.

The principal provisions of the Ordinance were—(1) Corporations styled in the ordinance "corresponding new banks" shall be established, each such corporation having paid-up capital equal to the paid-up capital of the named bank in relation to which it is a corresponding new bank. The entire capital of the new bank shall stand vested in the Central Government. The corresponding new banks shall be authorised to carry on and transact the business of banking as defined in clause (b) of section 5 of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, and also to engage in one or more forms of business specified in sub-section (1) of section 6 of that Act. The Chairman of the named bank holding office immediately before the commencement of the Ordinance shall be the Custodian of the corresponding new bank. The general superintendence and direction of the affairs and business of a corresponding bank shall be vested in the Custodian, who shall be the chief executive officer of that bank.

(2) The undertaking within or without India of every named bank on the commencement of the Ordinance shall stand transferred to and vested in the corresponding new bank. The expression "undertaking" shall include all assets, rights, powers, authorities and privileges, and all property, movable and immovable cash balances, reserve fund investments and all other rights and interests arising out of such property as are immediately before the commencement of the Ordinance in the ownership, possession, power or control of the named bank in relation to the undertaking, including all books of accounts, registers, records and all other documents of whatever nature relating thereto. It shall also include all borrowings, liabilities and obligations of whatever kind then subsisting of the named bank in relation to the undertaking. If according to the law of any foreign country, the provisions of the Ordinance by themselves do not effectively transfer or vest any asset or liability situated in that country in the corresponding new bank, the affairs of the named bank in relation to such asset or liability shall stand entrusted to the chief executive officer of the corresponding new bank with authority to take steps to wind up the affairs of that bank. All contracts, deeds, bonds, agreements, powers of attorney, grants of legal representation and other instruments of whatever nature subsisting or having effect immediately before the commencement of the Ordinance, and to which the named bank is a party or which are in favour of the named bank shall be of as full force and effect against or in favour of the corresponding new bank, and be enforced or acted upon as fully and effectively as if in the place of the named bank the corresponding new bank is a party thereto or as if they are issued in favour of the corresponding new bank. In pending suits or other proceedings by or against the named bank, the corresponding new bank shall be substituted in those suits or proceedings. Any reference to any named bank in any law, other than the Ordinance, or in any contract or other instrument shall be construed as a reference to the corresponding new bank in relation to it.

(3) The Central Government shall have power to frame a scheme for carrying out the provisions of the Act, and for that purpose to make provisions for the corresponding new banks relating to capital structure, constitution of the Board of Directors, manner of payment of compensation to the shareholders, and matters incidental, consequential and supplemental. Corresponding new banks shall also be guided in the discharge of their functions by such directions in regard to matters of policy involving public interest as the Central Government may give.

(4) On the commencement of the Ordinance, every person holding office as Chairman, Managing Director, or other Director of a named bank, shall be deemed to have vacated office, and all officers and other employees of a named bank shall become officers or other employees of the corresponding new banks. Every named bank shall stand dissolved on such date as the Central Government may by notification in that behalf appoint.

(5) The Central Government shall give compensation to the named banks determined according to the principles set out in Second Schedule, that is to say,—

(a) where the amount of compensation can be fixed by agreement, it shall be determined in accordance with such agreement.

(b) where no such agreement can be reached, the Central Government shall refer the matter to the Tribunal within a period of three months from the date on which the Central Government and the existing bank fail to reach an agreement regarding the amount of compensation.

Compensation so determined shall be paid to each named bank in marketable Central Government securities. For the purpose of determining compensation, Tribunals shall be set up by the Central Government with certain powers of a Civil Court.

(5) The Central Government shall have power to make such orders not inconsistent with the provisions of the Ordinance which may be necessary for the purpose of removing defects.

Under the Ordinance the entire undertaking of every named commercial bank was taken over by the corresponding new bank, and all assets and contractual rights and all obligations to which the named bank was subject stood transferred to the corresponding new bank. The Chairman and the Directors of the Banks vacated their respective offices. To the named banks survived only the right to receive compensation to be determined in the manner prescribed. Compensation, unless settled by agreement, was to be determined by the Tribunal, and was to be given in marketable Government securities. The entire business of each named bank was accordingly taken over, its chief executive officer ceased to hold office and assumed the office of Custodian of the corresponding new bank, its directors vacated office; and the services of the administrative and other staff stood transferred to the corresponding new bank. The named bank had thereafter no assets, no business, and no managerial administrative or other staff; it was incompetent to use the word "Bank" in its name, because of the provisions contained in section 7 (1) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, and was liable to be dissolved by a notification of the Central Government.

Petitions challenging the competence of the President to promulgate the Ordinance were lodged in this Court on 21st July, 1969. But before the petitions could be heard by this Court, a Bill to enact provisions relating to acquisition and transfer of undertakings of the existing banks was introduced in the Parliament, and was enacted on 9th August, 1969, as "The Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act XXII of 1969." The long title of the Act was in terms identical with the long title of the Ordinance. By sub-section (1) of section 27 of the Act, Ordinance VIII of 1969 was repealed. In the First Schedule were included the names of the 14 banks named in the Ordinance in juxtaposition with the names of the corresponding new banks. By sub-section (2) of section 1, the Act came into force on 19th July, 1969, and the undertaking of every named bank was deemed, with effect from that date, to have vested in the corresponding new bank. By section 27 (2), (3) and (4) actions taken or things done under the Ordinance inconsistent with the provisions of the Act were not to be of any force or effect, and no right, privilege, obligation or liability was to be deemed to have been acquired, accrued or incurred under the Ordinance.

The general scheme of the Ordinance relating to the transfer to and vesting in the corresponding new bank of the undertaking of each named bank, payment of compensation, and management of the corresponding new bank, remained unaltered. The Act departed from the Ordinance in certain matters :

(1) Under the Act the named banks remain in existence for certain purposes and they are not liable to be dissolved by order of the Government. If under the laws in force in any foreign country it is not permissible for a banking company, owned or controlled by Government, to carry on the business of banking in that country, the assets, rights, powers, authorities and privileges and property, movable and immovable, cash balances and investments of any named bank operating in that country shall not vest in the corresponding new bank. The directors of the named banks shall remain in office and may register transfers or transmission of shares ; arrive at an agreement about the amount of compensation payable under the Act or appear before the Tribunal for obtaining a determination as to the amount of compensation ; distribute to shareholders the amount of compensation received by the Bank under the Act for the acquisition of its undertaking ; carry on the business of banking in any country outside India if under the law in force in that country any bank, owned or controlled by Government, is prohibited from carrying on the business of banking there; and carry on any business other than the business of banking. The Central Government has power to authorise the corresponding new bank to advance the amount required by the named bank in connection with the functions which the directors may perform. Reference to any named bank in any law, or in any contract or other instrument shall be construed as a reference to the corresponding new bank in relation to it, but not in cases where the named bank may carry on any business and in relation to that business.

(2) Principles for determination of compensation and the manner of payment are modified. Interim compensation may be paid to a named bank if it agrees to distribute to its shareholders in accordance with their rights and interests. A major change is made in the principles for determining compensation set out in Schedule II. By Explanation I to clause (e) of Part I of Schedule II, the value of any land or buildings to be taken into account in valuing the assets is to be the market value of the land or buildings, but where such market value exceeds the "ascertained value", that "ascertained value" is to be taken into account, and by Explanation II the "ascertained value" of any building wholly occupied on the date of the commencement of the Act is to be twelve times the amount of the annual rent or the rent for which the building may reasonably be expected to be let out from year to year, and reduced by one-sixth of the amount of the rent on account of maintenance and repairs, annual premium paid to insure the building against risk of damage or destruction, annual charge, if any, on the building, ground rent, interest on any mortgage or other capital charge on the building, interest on borrowed capital if the building has been acquired, constructed, repaired, renewed or re-constructed with borrowed capital, and the sums paid on account of land revenue or other taxes in respect of such building.

(3) The Central Government may reconstitute any corresponding new bank into two or more corporations ; amalgamate any corresponding new bank or with another banking institution ; transfer the whole or any part of the undertaking of a corresponding new bank to any other banking institution ; or transfer the whole or any part of the undertaking of any other banking institution to a corresponding new bank. The Board of Directors of the corresponding new banks are to consist of representatives of the depositors of the corresponding new bank, employees of such banks, farmers, workers and artisans to be elected in the prescribed manner and of other persons as the Central Government may appoint.

(4) The profits remaining after making provision for bad and doubtful debts, depreciation in assets, contributions to staff and superannuation funds and all other matters for which provision is necessary under any law, the corresponding new bank shall transfer the balance of profits to the Central Government.

(5) Provision of law relating to winding up of corporations do not apply to the corresponding new banks, and a corresponding new bank may be ordered to be liquidated only by the order of the Central Government.

The petitioner challenges the validity of the Ordinance and the Act on the following principal grounds :

I. The Ordinance promulgated in exercise of the power under Article 123 of the Constitution was invalid, because the condition precedent to the exercise of the power did not exist ;

II. That in enacting the Act the Parliament encroached upon the State List in the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution, and to that extent the Act is outside the legislative competence of the Parliament ;

III. That by enactment of the Act, fundamental rights of the petitioner guaranteed by the Constitution under Articles 14, 19 (1) (f) and (g) and 31 (2) are impaired ;

IV. That by the Act the guarantee of freedom of trade under Article 301 is violated ; and

V. That in any event retrospective operation given to Act (XXII of 1969) is ineffective, since there was no valid Ordinance in existence. The provision in the Act retrospectively validating infringement of the fundamental rights of citizens was not within the competence of the Parliament. That sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 11 and section 26 are invalid.

The Attorney-General contended that the petitions are not maintainable, because no fundamental right of the petitioner is directly impaired by the enactment of the Ordinance and the Act, or by any action taken thereunder. He submitted that the petitioner who claims to be a shareholder, director and holder of deposit and current accounts with the Banks is not the owner of the property of the undertaking taken over by the corresponding new banks and is on that account incompetent to maintain the petitions complaining that the rights guaranteed under Articles 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution were impaired.

A company registered under the Companies Act is a legal person, separate and distinct from its individual members. Property of the Company is not the property of the shareholders. A shareholder has merely an interest in the company arising under its Articles of Association, measured by a sum of money for the purpose of liability, and by a share in the profit. Again a director of a company is merely its agent for the purpose of management. The holder of a deposit account in a company is its creditor : he is not the owner of any specific fund lying with the company. A shareholder, a depositor or a director may not therefore be entitled to move a petition for infringement of the rights of the company, unless by the action impugned by him, his rights are also infringed.

By a petition praying for a writ against infringement of fundamental rights, except in a case where the petition is for a writ of habeas corpus and probably for infringement of the guarantees under Articles 17, 23 and 24, the petitioner may seek relief in respect of his own rights and not of others. The shareholder of a company, it is true, is not the owner of its assets ; he has merely a right to participate in the profits of the company subject to the contract contained in the Articles of Association. But on that account the petitions will not fail. A measure executive or legislative may impair the rights of the company alone, and not of its shareholders ; it may impair the rights of the shareholders and not of the company : it may impair the rights of the shareholders as well as of the company. Jurisdiction of the Court to grant relief cannot be denied, when by State action the rights of the individual shareholder are impaired, if that action impairs the rights of the company as well. The test in determining whether the shareholder's right is impaired is not formal : it is essentially qualitative : if the State action impairs the right of the shareholders as well as of the company, the Court will not, concentrating merely upon the technical operation of the action, deny itself jurisdiction to grant relief.

The petitioner claims that by the Act and by the Ordinance the rights guaranteed to him under Articles 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution are impaired. He says that the Act and the Ordinance are without legislative competence in that they interfere with the guarantee of freedom of trade and are not made in the public interest ; that the Parliament had no legislative competence to enact the Act and the President had no power to promulgate the Ordinance, because the subject-matter of the Act and the Ordinance is (partially at least) within the State List ; and that the Act and Ordinance are invalid because they vest the undertaking of the named banks in the new corporations without a public purpose and without setting out principles and the basis for determination and payment of a just equivalent for the property expropriated. He says that in consequence of the hostile discrimination practised by the State the value of his investment in the shares is substantially reduced, his right to receive dividend from his investment has ceased, and he has suffered great financial loss, he is deprived of the right as a shareholder to carry on business through the agency of the company, and that in respect of the deposits the obligations of the corresponding new banks not of his choice are substituted without his consent.

In *Dwarkadas Shrinivas v. The Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company Limited and others*¹, this Court held that a preference shareholder of a company is competent to maintain a suit challenging the validity of the "Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company (Emergency Provisions) Ordinance" 2 of 1950 (which was later replaced by Act XXVII of 1950), which deprived the company of its property without payment of compensation within the meaning of Article 31. Mahajan, J., observed :

"The plaintiff and the other preference shareholders are in imminent danger of sustaining direct injury as a result of the enforcement of this Ordinance, the direct injury being the amount of the call that they are called upon to pay and the consequent forfeiture of their shares."

Das, J., in the same case examined the matter in some detail and observed at page 722 :

"The impugned Ordinance, * * * directly affects the preference shareholders by imposing on them this liability, or the risk of it, and gives them a sufficient interest to challenge the validity of the Ordinance, * * * Certainly he can show that the Ordinance under which these persons have been appointed was beyond the legislative competence of the authority which made it or that the Ordinance had not been duly promulgated. If he can, with a view to destroy the locus standi of the persons who have made the call raise the question of the invalidity of the Ordinance * * *, I can see no valid reason why, for the self same purpose, he should not be permitted to challenge the validity of the Ordinance on the ground of its unconstitutionality for the breach of the fundamental rights of the company or of other persons."

The judgment of this Court in *The State Trading Corporation of India Limited and others v. The Commercial Tax Officer, Visakhapatnam and others*³, has no bearing on this question. In that case in a petition under Article 32 of the Constitution the State Trading Corporation challenged the infringement of its right to hold property and to carry on business under Article 19 (1) (f) and (g) of the Constitution, and this Court opined that the Corporation not being a citizen was incompetent to enforce the rights guaranteed by Article 19. Nor has the judgment in *Tata Engineering and Locomotive Company Limited v. State of Bihar and others*⁴, any bearing on the question arising in these petitions. In a petition under Article 32 of the Constitution filed by a Company challenging the levy of sales-tax by the State of Bihar, two shareholders were also impleaded as petitioners. It was urged on behalf of the shareholders that in substance the interests of the Company and of the shareholders were identical and the shareholders were entitled to maintain the petition. The Court rejected that contention, observing that what the Company could not achieve directly, it could not relying upon the doctrine of "lifting the veil" achieve indirectly. The petitioner seeks in this case to challenge the infringement of his own rights and not of the Banks of which he is a shareholder and a director and with which he has accounts—current and fixed deposit.

It was urged that in any event the guarantee of freedom of trade does not occur in Part III of the Constitution, and the petitioner is not entitled to maintain a petition for breach of that guarantee in this Court. But the petitioner does not seek by these petitions to enforce the guarantee of freedom of trade and commerce in Article 301 : he claims that in enacting the Act the Parliament has violated a constitutional restriction imposed by Part XIII on its legislative power and in determining the extent to which his fundamental freedoms are impaired, the statute which the Parliament is incompetent to enact must be ignored.

It is not necessary to consider whether Article 31-A (1) (d) of the Constitution bars the petitioner's claim to enforce his rights as a director. The Act prima facie does not (though the Ordinance purported to) seek to extinguish or modify the right of the petitioner as a director : it seeks to take away expressly the right of the named Banks to carry on banking business, while reserving their right to carry on business other than banking. Assuming that he is not entitled to set up his right to enforce his guaranteed rights as a director, the petition will not still fail. The Preliminary objection raised by the Attorney-General against the maintainability of the petitions must fail.

I. Validity of Ordinance 8 of 1969—

Power to issue Ordinance is by Article 123 of the Constitution vested in the President. Article 123 provides :

"(1) If at any time, except when both Houses of Parliament are in session, the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action, he may promulgate such Ordinance as the circumstances appear to him to require.

(2) An Ordinance promulgated under this Article shall have the same force and effect as an Act of Parliament, but every such Ordinance—

(a) shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the re-assembly of Parliament, or, if before the expiration of that period resolutions disapproving it are passed by both Houses, upon the passing of the second of those resolutions ; and

(b) may be withdrawn at any time by the President.

Explanation.—Where the Houses of Parliament are summoned to re-assemble on different dates, the period of six weeks shall be reckoned from the later of those dates for the purposes of this clause.

(3) If and so far as an Ordinance under this article makes any provision which Parliament would not under this Constitution be competent to enact, it shall be void."

Under the Constitution, the President being the constitutional head, normally acts in all matters including the promulgation of an Ordinance on the advice of his Council of Ministers. Whether in a given case the President may decline to be guided by the advice of his Council of Ministers is a matter which need not detain us. The Ordinance is promulgated in the name of the President and in a constitutional sense on his satisfaction : it is in truth promulgated on the advice of his Council of Ministers and on their satisfaction. The President is under the Constitution not the repository of the legislative power of the Union, but with a view to meet extraordinary situations demanding immediate enactment of laws, provision is made in the Constitution investing the President with power to legislate by promulgating Ordinances.

Power to promulgate such Ordinance as the circumstances appear to the President to require is exercised—(a) when both Houses of Parliament are not in session; (b) the provision intended to be made is within the competence of the Parliament to enact; and (c) the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action. Exercise of the power is strictly conditioned. The clause relating to the satisfaction is composite: the satisfaction relates to the existence of circumstances, as well as to the necessity to take immediate action on account of those circumstances. Determination by the President of the existence of circumstances and the necessity to take immediate action on which the satisfaction depends, is not declared final.

The Attorney-General contended that the condition of satisfaction of the President in both the branches is purely subjective and the Union of India is under no obligation to disclose the existence of, or to justify the circumstances of the necessity to take immediate action. He relied upon the decisions of the Judicial Committee in *Bhagat Singh v. The King Emperor*¹; *King Emperor v. Benoari Lal Sharma*²; and upon a decision of the Federal Court in *Lakhi Narayan Das v. The Province of Bihar*³, which interpreted the analogous provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, conferring upon the Governor-General in the first two cases, and upon the Governor of a Province in the last case, power to issue Ordinances. He also relied upon the judgment of the Judicial Committee in *Hubli Electricity Company Limited v. Province of Bombay*⁴.

The Attorney-General said that investment of legislative power upon the President being an incident of the division of sovereign functions of the Union and a "matter of high policy", the expression "the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action" is incorporated as a guidance and not as a condition of the exercise of power. He invited our attention to the restraints inherent in the Constitution on the exercise of the power to promulgate Ordinance in clauses (1) and (2) of Article 74; clauses (3) and (4) of Articles 75 and Article 361, and submitted that the rule applicable to the interpretation of Parliamentary Statutes conferring authority upon officers of the State to act in a prescribed manner on being satisfied about the existence of certain circumstances is inept in determining the true perspective of the power of the head of the State in situations of emergency.

On the other hand, Mr. Palkhivala contended that the President is not made by Article 123 the final arbiter of the existence of the conditions on which the power to promulgate an Ordinance may be exercised. Power to promulgate an Ordinance being conditional, counsel urged, this Court in the absence of a provision—express or necessarily implicit in the Constitution—to the contrary, is competent to determine whether the power was exercised not for a collateral purpose, but on relevant circumstances which, prima facie, establish the necessity to take immediate action. Counsel submitted that the rules applicable to the interpretation of statutes conferring power exercisable on satisfaction of the specified circumstances upon the President and upon officers of the State, are not different. The nature of the power to perform an official act where the authority is of a certain opinion, or that in his view certain circumstances exist or that he has reasonable grounds to believe, or that he has reasons to believe, or that he is satisfied, springing from a constitutional provision is in no manner different from a similar power under a Parliamentary Statute, and no greater sanctity may attach to the exercise of the power merely because the source of the power is in the Constitution and not in a Parliamentary Statute. There is, it was urged, nothing in the constitutional scheme which supports the contention that the clause relating to satisfaction is not a condition of the exercise of power.

Counsel relied upon the judgments of this Court in *Barium Chemicals Ltd. and another v. The Company Law Board and others*¹ and *Rohitas Industries Ltd. v. S. D. Agarwal and another*²; upon the decisions of the House of Lords in *Padfield and others v. Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and others*³; and of the Judicial Committee in *Durayappah v. Fernando and others*⁴; *Nakkuda Ali v. M. F. De. S. Jayaratne*⁵; *Ross-Glunis v. Papadopoulos*⁶, and contended that the decisions of the Judicial Committee in *Bhagat Singh's case*⁷, and *Benoari Lal Sarma's case*⁸, interpreted a provision which was in substance different from the provision of Article 123, that the decision in *Lakhi Narayan Das's case*⁹, merely followed the two judgments of the Judicial Committee and since the status of the President under the Constitution qua the Parliament is not the same as the constitutional status of the Governor-General under the Government of India Act, 1935, the decisions cited have no bearing on the interpretation of Article 123.

The Ordinance has been repealed by Act (XXII of 1969), and the question of its validity is now academic. It may assume significance only if we hold that Act (XXII of 1969) is valid. Since the Act is, in our view, invalid for reasons hereinafter stated, we accede to the submission of the Attorney-General that we need express no opinion in this case on the extent of the jurisdiction of the Court to examine whether the condition relating to satisfaction of the President was fulfilled.

II. Authority of Parliament to enact Act (XXII of 1969) —

On behalf of the petitioner it is urged that the Act is not within the legislative power of the Parliament and that, in any event, to the extent to which it vests in the corresponding new banks the assets of business other than banking, it trenches upon the authority of the State Legislature, and is on that account void. The relevant legislative entries in the Seventh Schedule and the constitutional provisions which have a bearing on the question of acquisition and taking over of undertaking of a bank may first be read.

The Parliament has exclusive legislative power with respect to "Banking" Entry 45 List I; "Incorporation, regulation and winding up of trading Corporations including banking, insurance and financial corporations but not including co-operative societies"; Entry 43 List I; and "Incorporation, regulation and winding up of corporations, whether trading or not, with objects not confined to one State, but not including Universities": Entry 44, List I.

The States have exclusive legislative authority with respect to the following subjects in List II:

Entry 26—"Trade and commerce within the State, subject to the provisions of entry 33 of List III;"

Entry 30—"Money-lending and money-lenders; relief of agricultural indebtedness."

The Parliament and the States have concurrent legislative authority with respect to the following subjects in List III;

Entry 33—"Trade and commerce in, and the production, supply and distribution of,—

(a) the products of any industry where the control of such industry by the Union is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest, and imported goods of the same kind as such products;

(b) foodstuffs, including edible oilseeds and oils;

(c) cattle fodder, including oilcakes and other concentrates;

(e) raw jute."

Entry 42—"Acquisition and requisition of property."

The argument raised by Mr. Setalvad, intervening on behalf of the State of Maharashtra and the State of Jammu and Kashmir, that the Parliament is competent to enact Act (XXII of 1969,) because the subject-matter of the Act is "with respect to" regulation of trading corporations and matters subsidiary and incidental thereto and on that account is covered in its entirety by Entries 43 and 44 of List I of the, Seventh Schedule, cannot be upheld. Entry 43 deals with incorporation, regulation and winding up of trading corporations including banking companies. Law regulating the business of a corporation is not a law with respect to regulation of a corporation. In List I entries expressly relating to trade and commerce are Entries 41 and 42. Again several entries in List I relate to activities commercial in character. Entry 45 "Banking"; Entry 46 "Bills of exchange, cheques promissory notes and other like instruments," Entry 47 "Insurance"; Entry 48 "Stock exchanges and future markets"; Entry 49 "Patents, inventions and designs." There are several entries relating to activities commercial as well as non-commercial in List II—Entry 21 "Fisheries;" Entry 24 "Industries x x x"; Entry 25 "Gas and Gas works;" Entry 26 "Trade and commerce"; Entry 30 "Money-lending and money-lenders;" Entry 31 "Inns and Inn-keeping;" Entry 33 "Theatres and dramatic performances cinemas, etc." We are unable to accede to the argument that the State Legislatures are competent to legislate in respect of the subject-matter of those entries only when the commercial activities are carried on by individuals and not when they are carried on by Corporations.

The object of Act (XXII of 1969) is to transfer the undertaking of each named bank and to vest it in the corresponding new bank set up with authority to carry on banking and other business. Each such corresponding new bank is controlled by the Central Government of which the entire capital is to stand vested in and allotted to the Central Government. The principal provisions of the Act which effectuate that object relate to—setting up of "corresponding new banks" as statutory corporations to carry on and transact the business of banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, and one or more other forms of business specified in section 6 (1) of that Act, with power to acquire and hold property for the purpose of the business, and to dispose of the same; administration of the corresponding new banks as institutions carrying on banking and other business; the undertaking of each named bank in its entirety stands transferred to and vested in a new corporation set up for that purpose; principles for determination of compensation and method of payment thereof to each named bank for transfer of its undertaking; and that the named bank may not carry on banking business, but may carry out business other than banking.

Mr. Palkhivala submitted that the Parliament may legislate in respect of the business of banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, and matters incidental thereto, and also for acquisition of that part of the undertaking of each named bank which relates to the business of banking, but not in respect of any other business not incidental to banking in which the named bank was engaged prior to 19th July, 1969, for the power to legislate in respect of such other business falls within Entry 26 of List II. As a corollary thereto, counsel submitted that power to legislate in respect of acquisition under Entry 42 of List III may be exercised by the Parliament only for effectuating legislation under a head falling in List I or List III of the Seventh Schedule.

It is necessary to determine the true scope of "banking" in Entry 35, List I, the meaning of the expression "property," and the limitations on the power of the Parliament to legislate in respect of acquisition of property in Entry 42, List III. Matters not in contest may be eliminated. Power to legislate for setting up corporations to carry on banking and other business and to acquire, hold and dispose of property and to provide for administration of the corporations is conferred upon the Parliament by Entries 43, 44 and 45 of the first list. Power to enact that the named banks shall not carry on banking business [as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act] is incidental to the power to legislate in respect of banking. Power to legislate for determination of compensation and method of payment of compensation for compulsory acquisition of the assets of the named banks, in so far as it relates to banking business is also within the power of the Parliament.

The expression "banking" is not defined in any Indian statute except the Banking Regulation Act, 1949. It may be recalled that by section 5 (b) of that Act "banking" means "the accepting for the purpose of lending or investment of deposits of money from the public repayable on demand or otherwise, and withdrawable by cheque, draft or otherwise." The definition did not include other commercial activities which a banking institution may engage in.

In support of his contention Mr. Palkhivala relied upon the observation of Lord Porter in *Commonwealth of Australia v. Bank of New South Wales*¹, that banking consists of the creation and transfer of credit, the making of loans, purchase and disposal of investments and other kindred transactions; and upon the statement in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Edn. Vol 2, Article 270 at pages 150 and 151 that:

"A 'banker' is an individual partnership or corporation, whose sole or predominating business is banking, that is the receipt of money on current or deposit account and the payment of cheques drawn by and the collection of cheques paid by a customer," and in the foot-note (g) at page 151 that:

"Numerous other functions are undertaken at the present day by banks such as the payment of domiciled bills, custody of valuables, discounting bills, executor and trustee business, or acting in relation to stock exchange transactions, and banks have functions under certain financial legislation, * * * . These functions are not strictly banking business."

The Attorney-General said that the expression "banking" in Entry 45 List I means all form of business which since the introduction of western methods of banking in India, banking institutions have been carrying on in addition to banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, and on that account all forms of business described in section 6 (1) of the Banking Regulation Act in clauses (a) to (n) are, if carried on in addition to the "hard-core of banking," banking and the Parliament is competent to legislate in respect of that business under Entry 45 List I. In support of his contention that apart from the business of accepting money from the public for lending or investment, and withdrawable by cheque draft or otherwise, banking includes many allied business activities which banking institutions engaged in, the Attorney-General invited our attention to clause 21 of the Charter of the Bank of Bengal Act (VI of 1839); section 27 of Act IV of 1862; to sections 36 and 37 of the Presidency Banks Act (XI of 1876); to section 91 (15) of the British North America Act; to Paget's Law of Banking, 7th Edition at page 5; to the standard form of memorandum of association of a Banking Company in Palmer's Company Presidents Form 138; and to the statement of objects and reasons in support of the Bill which was enacted as the Indian Companies (Amendment) Act, 1936.

The Charter of the Bank of Bengal, the Presidency Banks Act IV of 1862, Chapter X-A of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, as incorporated by the Indian Companies (Amendment) Act, 1936, merely described the business which a banking institution could carry on. It was not intended thereby to include those activities within the expression "banking." The Acts enacted after the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, also support that inference. Under section 33 of the State Bank of India Act, 1955, the State Bank is entitled to carry on diverse business activities beside banking. Similarly the banks subsidiary to the State Bank were by section 36 of Act (XXXVIII of 1959) to act as agents of the State Bank, and also to carry on and transact business of banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, and were also competent to engage in such one or more other forms of business specified in section 6 (1) of that Act. These provisions do not aid in construing the Entry "Banking" in Entry 45 List I.

In modern times in India as elsewhere, to attract business, banking establishments render, and complete in rendering, a variety of miscellaneous services for their constituents. If the test for determining what "banking" means in the constitutional entry is any commercial activity which bankers at a given time engage in, great obscurity will be introduced in the content of that expression. The coverage of constitutional entry in a Federal Constitution which carves out a field of legislation must depend upon a more satisfactory basis.

The legislative entry in List I of the Seventh Schedule is "Banking" and not "Banker" or "Banks." To include within the connotation of the expression "Banking" in Entry 45 List I, power to legislate in respect of all commercial activities which a banker by the custom of bankers or authority of law engages in, would result in rewriting the Constitution. Investment of power to legislate on a designated topic covers all matters incidental to the topic. A legislative entry being expressed in a broad designation indicating the contour of plenary power must receive a meaning conducive to the widest amplitude, subject however to limitations inherent in the federal scheme which distributes legislative power between the Union and the constituent units. But the field of "banking" cannot be extended to include trading activities which not being incidental to banking encroach upon the substance of the entry "trade and commerce" in List II.

Rejection of the argument of the Attorney-General does not lend any practical support to the argument of Mr. Palkhivala that Act (XXII of 1969), to the extent it makes provisions in respect of the undertaking of the named banks relating to non-banking business, is ultra vires the Parliament. In the first instance there is no evidence that the named banks were before 19th July, 1969, carrying on non-banking business distinct and independent of the banking business, or that the banks held distinct assets for any non-banking business, apart from the assets of the banking business. Again by Act (XXII of 1969) the corresponding banks are entitled to engage in business of banking and non-banking which the named banks were engaged in or competent to engage in prior to 19th July, 1969, and the named banks are entitled to engage in business other than banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, but not the business of banking. By enacting that the corresponding new banks may carry on business specified in section 6 (1) of the Banking Regulation Act and that the named banks shall not carry on banking business as defined in section 5 (b) of that Act, the impugned Act did not encroach upon any entry in the State List. By section 15 (2) (c) of the impugned Act the named banks are expressly reserved the right to carry on business other than banking, and it is not claimed that thereby there is any encroachment upon the State List. Exercise of the power to legislate for acquisition of the undertaking of the named banks also does not trespass upon the State List.

Before the Constitutions (Seventh Amendment) Act, Entry 33, List I invested the Parliament with power to enact laws with respect to acquisition or requisitioning for the purpose of the Union, and Entry 36, List II conferred upon the State Legislature the power to legislate with respect to acquisition or requisitioning for the remaining purposes. Those entries are now deleted, and a single Entry 42, List III invests the Parliament and the State Legislature with power to legislate with respect to "acquisition and requisitioning" of property. By Entry 42 in the Concurrent List power conferred upon the Parliament and the State Legislatures to legislate with respect to "Principles on which compensation for property acquired or requisitioned for the purpose of the Union or for any other public purpose is to be determined, and the form in which such compensation is to be given." Power to legislate for acquisition of property is exercisable only under Entry 42 of List III, and not as an incident of the power to legislate in respect of a specific head of legislation in any of the three lists; *Rajahmundry Electric Supply Corporation Ltd. v. The State of Andhra*¹. Under that entry "property" can be compulsorily acquired. In its normal connotation "property" means the "highest right a man can have to anything, being that right which one has to lands or tenements, goods or chattels which does not depend on another's courtesy; it includes ownership, estates and interests in corporeal things, and also rights such as trademark, copyrights, patents and even rights in personam capable of transfer or transmission, such as debts; and signifies a beneficial right to or a thing considered as having a money value, especially with reference to transfer or succession, and to their capacity of being injured." The expression "undertaking" in section 4 of Act XXII of 1969 clearly means a going concern with all its rights, liabilities and assets—as distinct from the various rights and assets which compose it. In Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Edn. Vol. 6, Article 75 at page 43, it is stated that "Although various ingredients go to make up an undertaking, the term describes not the ingredients but the completed work from which the earning arise."

Transfer of and vesting in the State Corporations of the entire undertaking of a going concern is contemplated in many Indian Statutes: e.g., Indian Electricity Act, 1910 sections 6, 7 and 7-A; Air Corporation Act, 1953, sections 16 and 17; Imperial Bank of India Act, 1920, sections 3 and 4; State Bank of India Act, 1955, sections 6 (2), (3) and (4); State Bank of India (Subsidiary Banks) Act, 1959; Banking Regulation Act, 1949, section 36 AE.; and Cotton Textile Companies Act, 1967, sections 5 (1) and (5) 1. Power to legislate for acquisition of "property" in Entry 42 List III therefore includes the power to legislate for acquisition of an undertaking. But, says Mr. Palkhivala, liabilities of the banks which are included in the connotation of the expression "undertaking" cannot be treated as "property". It is however the assets, rights and obligations of a going concern which constitute the undertaking: the obligations and liabilities of the business form an integral part of the undertaking, and for compulsory acquisition cannot be divorced from the assets, rights and privileges. The expression "property" in Entry 42, List III has a wide connotation, and it includes not only assets, but the organisation, liabilities and obligations of a going concern as a unit. A law may, therefore, be enacted for compulsory acquisition of an undertaking as defined in section 5 of (Act XXII of 1969).

The contention raised by Mr. Palkhivala that the Parliament is incompetent to legislate for acquisition of the named banks in so far as it relates to assets of the non-banking business fails for two reasons—(i) that there is no evidence that the named banks held any assets for any distinct non-banking business; and (ii) that the acquisition is not shown to fall within an entry in List II of the Seventh Schedule.

III. Infringement of the fundamental rights of the petitioner—

Clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 subordinate the exercise of the power of the State to the basic concept of the rule of law. Deprivation of a person of his property and compulsory acquisition may be effectuated by the authority of law. It is superfluous to add that the law limiting the authority of the State must be within the competent of the Legislature enacting it, and not violative of a constitutional prohibition, nor impairing the guarantee of a fundamental right. This Court held in *Kesavaiah v. Kottarathil Kechani and others v. The State of Madras and others*²; *Sri Maharaja Shri Jayaramsinghji v. The State of Gujarat*³, and *Motor Transport Company (P.) Ltd. v. Sri Sankarasinghji Mulla*⁴, that a person may be deprived of his property by authority of a statute only if it does not impair the fundamental rights guaranteed to him. It is again not contested on behalf of the Union that the law authorising acquisition of property must be within the competence of the law-making authority and must not violate a constitutional prohibition or impair the guarantee of any of the fundamental rights in Part III. But it is claimed that since Article 31 (2) and Article 19 (1) (f) while operating on the same field of the right to property are mutually exclusive, a law directly providing for acquisition of property for a public purpose cannot be tested for its validity on the plea that it imposes limitations on the right to property which are not reasonable.

By Article 31 (1) and (2) the right to property of individuals is protected against specific invasions by State action. The function of the two clauses—Clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31—is to impose limitations on the power of the State and to declare the corresponding guarantee of the individual to his right to property. Limitation on the power of the State and the guarantee of right are plainly complementary. Protection of the guarantee is ensured by declaring that a person may be deprived of his property by “authority of law”: Article 31 (1); and that private property may be compulsorily acquired for a public purpose and by the “authority of a law” containing provisions fixing or providing for determination and payment of compensation: Article 31 (2). Exercise of either power by State action results in abridgement—total or partial—of the right to property of the individual. Article 19 (1) (f) is a positive declaration in the widest terms of the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property, subject to restrictions (which may assume the form of limitations or complete prohibition) imposed by law in the interests of the general public. The guarantee under Article 19 (1) (f) does not protect merely an abstract right to property: It extends to concrete rights to property as well: *Swami Motor Transport Co. (P.) Ltd.’s case*¹.

The constitutional scheme declares the right to property of the individual and then delimits it by two different provisions: Article 19 (5) authorizing the State to make laws imposing reasonable restrictions on the exercise of that right, and clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 recognizing the authority of the State to make laws for taking the property. Limitations under Article 19 (5) and Article 31 are not generically different, for the law authorizing the exercise of the power to take the property of an individual for a public purpose or to ensure the well-being of the community, and the law authorising the imposition of reasonable restrictions under Article 19 (5) are intended to advance the larger public interest. It is true that the guarantee against deprivation and compulsory acquisition operates in favour of all persons, citizens as well as non-citizens, whereas the positive declaration of the right to property guarantees the right to citizens. But a wider operation of the guarantee under Article 31 does not alter the true character of the right it protects. Article 19 (5) and Article 31 (1) and (2), in our judgment, operate to delimit the exercise of the right to hold property.

Under the Constitution, protection against impairment of the guarantee of fundamental rights is determined by the nature of the right the interest of the aggrieved party and the degree of harm resulting from the State action. Impairment of the right of the individual and not the object of the State in taking the impugned action, is the measure of protection. To concentrate merely on power of the State and the object of the State action in exercising that power is therefore to ignore the true intent of the Constitution. In this Court, there is, however, a body of authority that the nature and extent of the protection of the fundamental rights is measured not by the operation of the State action upon the rights of the individual, but by its object. Thereby the constitutional scheme which makes the guaranteed rights subject to the permissible restrictions within their allotted fields fundamental got blurred and gave impetus to a theory that certain Articles of the Constitutions enact a code dealing exclusively with matters dealt with therein, and the protection which an aggrieved person may claim is circumscribed by the object of the State action.

1. (1964) 1 An.W.R. (S.C.) 146: (1964) 1 M.L.J. (S.C.) 146 : (1964) 1 S.C.J. 530.

Protection of the right to property or personal freedom is most needed when there is an actual threat. To argue that State action which deprives a person permanently or temporarily of his right to property, or personal freedom, operates to extinguish the right or the remedy is to reduce the guarantee to an empty platitude. Again to hold that the extent of, and the circumstances in which, the guarantee of protection is available depends upon the object of the State action, is to seriously erode its effectiveness. Examining the problem not merely in semantics but in the broader and more appropriate context of the constitutional scheme which aims at affording the individual the fullest protection of his basic rights and on that foundation to erect a structure of a truly democratic polity, the conclusion, in our judgment, is inevitable that the validity of the State action must be adjudged in the right of its operation upon the rights of the individual and groups of individuals in all their dimensions.

But this Court has held in some cases to be presently noticed that Article 19 (1) (f) and Article 31 (2) are mutually exclusive.

Early in the history of this Court the question of inter-relation between the diverse provisions affording the guarantee of fundamental rights in Part III fell to be determined. In *A. K. Gopalan v. The State of Madras*¹, a person detained pursuant to an order made in exercise of the power conferred by the Preventive Detention Act (IV of 1950) applied to this Court for a writ of habeas corpus claiming that the Act contravened the guarantee under Articles 19, 21 and 22 of the Constitution. The majority of the Court (Kania, C.J., and Patanjali Sastri, Mahajan, Mukherjea and Das, J.J.) held that Article 22 being a complete code relating to preventive detention, the validity of an order of detention must be determined strictly according to the terms and "within the four corners of that Article". They held that a person detained may not claim that the freedom guaranteed under Article 19 (1) (d) was infringed by his detention, and that validity of the law providing for making orders of detention will not be tested in the light of the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed thereby on the freedom of movement, nor on the ground that his right to personal liberty is infringed otherwise than according to the procedure established by law. Fazl Ali, J., expressed a contrary view. This case has formed the nucleus of the theory that the protection of the guarantee of a fundamental freedom must be adjudged in the light of the object of State action is relation to the individual's right and not upon its influence upon the guarantee of the fundamental freedom, and as a corollary thereto, that the freedoms under Articles 19, 21, 22 and 31 are exclusive—each Article enacting a code relating to protection of distinct rights.

Kania, C.J., proceeded on the theory that different Articles guarantee distinct rights. He observed at page 100 :

".....it (Article 19) * * means that the legislation to be examined must be directly in respect of one of the rights mentioned in the sub-clauses. If there is a legislation directly attempting to control a citizen's freedom of speech or expression, or his right to assemble peaceably and without arms, etc., the question whether that legislation is saved by the relevant saving clause of article 19 will arise. If, however, the legislation is not directly in respect of any of these subjects, but as a result of the operation of other legislation, * * * the question of the application of Article 19 does not arise. The true approach is only to consider the directness of the legislation and not what will be the result of the detention otherwise valid, on the mode of the detenu's life".

The learned Chief Justice also observed that Article 19 (1) (d) had nothing to do with detention, preventive or punitive, and the concept of personal liberty in Article 21 being entirely different from the concept of the right to move freely throughout the territory of India, Article 22 was a complete code dealing with preventive detention.

Patanjali Sastri, J., observed at page 191 :

".....Article 19 seems * * to pre-suppose that the citizens to whom the possession of these fundamental rights in secured retains the substratum of personal freedom on which alone the enjoyment of these rights necessarily rest. * * Article 19 guarantees to the citizens the enjoyment of certain civil liberties while they are free, while Articles 20-22 secure to all persons—citizens and non-citizens—certain constitutional guarantees in regard to punishment and prevention of crime.”

1. (1950) S.C.R. 88 : (1950) S.C.J. 174 : (1950) 2 M.L.J. 42.

Mahajan, J., was of the view that Article 22 was “self-contained in respect of laws on the subject of preventive detention.” Mukherjea, J., observed (at page 254) that there was no conflict between Article 19 (1) (d) and Article 22, for the former did not contemplate freedom from detention either punitive or preventive, but speaks of a different aspect or phase of civil liberty. In his view Articles 20 to 22 embodied the entire protection guaranteed by the Constitution in relation to deprivation of life and personal liberty with regard to substantive as well as procedural law. He proceeded to observe at page 261.

“..... by reason of preventive detention, a man may be prevented from exercising the right of free movement within the territory in India * * *, but that is merely incidental to or consequential upon loss of liberty resulting from the order of detention.”

But the learned Judge observed at page 263 :

“It may not, I think, be quite accurate to state that the operation of Article 19 of the Constitution is limited to free citizens only and that the rights have been described in that Article on the pre-supposition that the citizens are at liberty. The deprivation of personal liberty may entail as a consequence the loss or abridgement of many of the rights described in Article 19, but that is because the nature of these rights is such that free exercise of them is not possible in the absence of personal liberty.”

Das, J., observed at page 304 :

“Therefore, the conclusion is irresistible that the rights protected by Article 19 (1), in so far as they relate to rights attached to the person, i.e., the rights referred to in sub-clauses (a) to (e) and (g) are rights which only a free citizen, who has the freedom of his person unimpaired, can exercise.”

The learned Judge further observed :

“..... a lawful detention, whether punitive or preventive, does not offend against the protection conferred by Article 19 (1) (a) to (e) and (g), for those rights must necessarily cease when the freedom of the person is lawfully taken away. In short, those rights end where the lawful detention begins. So construed, Article 19 and Article 21 may, therefore, easily go together and there is, in reality, no conflict between them.”

Fazal Ali, J., struck a different note : he observed at page 148 :

“the scheme of the Chapter dealing with the fundamental rights does not contemplate * * * * that each Article is a code by itself and is independent of the others. * * * The case of a person who is convicted of an offence will come under Articles 20 and 21 and also under Article 22 so far as his arrest and detention in custody before trial are concerned. Preventive detention, which is dealt with in Article 22, also amounts to deprivation of personal liberty which is referred to in Article 21, and is a violation of the right of freedom of movement dealt with in Article 19 (1) (d).”

At page 149 the learned Judge observed :

“The words used in Article 19 (1) (d) must be construed as they stand, and we have to decide upon the words themselves whether in the case of preventive detention the right under Article 19 (1) (d) is or is not infringed. But, * * * however literally we may construe the words used in Article 19 (1) (d) and however restricted may be the meaning we may attribute to those words, there can be no escape from the conclusion that preventive detention is a direct infringement of the right guaranteed in Article 19 (1) (d)."

At page 170 he observed :

".....this Article (Article 22) * * * * does not exclude the operation of Articles 19 and 21, and it must be read subject to those two Articles, in the same way as Articles 19 and 21 must be read subject to Article 22. The correct position is that Article 22 must prevail in so far as there are specific provisions therein regarding preventive detention, but where there are no such provisions in that Article, the operation of Articles 19 and 21 cannot be excluded. The mere fact that different aspects of the same right have been dealt with in three different Articles will not make them mutually exclusive except to the extent I have indicated."

The view expressed in *A. K. Gopalan's case*¹, was re-affirmed in *Ram Singh and others v. The State of Delhi*².

The principle underlying the judgment of the majority was extended to the protection of the freedom in respect of property, and it was held that Article 19 (1) (f) and Article 31 (2) were mutually exclusive in their operation. In *A. K. Gopalan's case*¹, Das, J., suggested that if the capacity to exercise the right to property was lost, because of lawful compulsory acquisition of the subject of that right, the owner ceased to have that right for the duration of the incapacity. In *Ghironji Lal Chowdhuri's case*³, Das, J., observed at page 919 :

".....the right to property guaranteed by Article 19 (1) (f) would * * continue until the owner was under Article 31 deprived of such property by authority of law."

In *The State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal*⁴, the same learned Judge observed that "Article 19 (1) (f) read with Article 19 (5) pre-supposes that the person to whom the fundamental right is guaranteed retains his property over or with respect to which alone that right may be exercised". The principle so stated was given a more concrete shape in a later decision : *State of Bombay v. Bhanji Munji and another*⁵. In *Bhanji Munji's case*⁵, speaking for a unanimous Court, Bose, J., observed :

".....it is enough to say that Article 19 (1) (f) read with clause (5) postulates the existence of property which can be enjoyed, and over which rights can be exercised because otherwise the reasonable restrictions contemplated by clause (5) could not be brought into play. If there is no property which can be acquired held or disposed of, no restriction can be placed on the exercise of the right to acquire, hold or dispose it of, and as clause (5) contemplates the placing of reasonable restrictions on the exercise of those rights it must follow that the Article postulates the existence of property over which the rights are to be exercised."

*Bhanji Munji's case*⁵, was accepted without any discussion in *Babu Barkya Thakur v. The State of Bombay*⁶; *Smt. Sitabati Debi and another v. State of West Bengal and another*⁷, and other cases. In these cases it was held that the substantive provisions of a law relating to acquisition of property were not liable to be challenged on the ground that they imposed unreasonable restrictions on the right to hold property.

*Bhanji Munji's case*⁵, it must be remembered, arose under Article 31 before it was amended by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act. It was held by this Court that clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 as they then stood dealt with the same subject-matter, i.e., compulsory acquisition of property : see *Subodh Gopal's case*⁴, and *Dwarkadas Shrinivas's case*⁸. But since the amendment by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act it has been held that clauses (1) and (2) deal with different subject-matters. delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court observed that clause (2) of Article 31 alone deals with compulsory acquisition of property by the State for a public purpose, and not Article 31 (1), and he proceeded to hold that the expression "authority of law" means authority of a valid law, and on that account validity of the law seeking to deprive a person of his property is open to challenge on the ground that it infringes other fundamental rights, e.g., under Article 19 (1) (f). It was broadly observed that *Bhanji Munji's case*¹, after the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act "no longer holds the field". But *Kavalappara Kottarathil Kochuni's case*², did not deal with the validity of a law relating to compulsory acquisition. With the decision in Kavalappara Kottarathil Kochuni's case, there arose two divergent lines of authority: (1) "authority of law" in Article 31 (1) is liable to be tested on the ground that it violates other fundamental rights and freedoms including the right to hold property guaranteed by Article 19 (1) (f); and (2) "authority of a law" within the meaning of Article 31 (2) is not liable to be tested on the ground that it impairs the guarantee of Article 19 (1) (f) in so far as it imposes substantive restrictions—though it may be tested on the ground of impairment of other guarantees. The expression "law" in the two clauses had therefore different meanings. It was for the first time (obiter dicta apart) in *The State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ranojirao Shinde*³, this Court opined that the validity of the law in clause (2) of Article 31 may be adjudged in the light of Article 19 (1) (f). But the Court in that case did not consider the previous catena of authorities which related to the inter-relation between Article 31 (2) and Article 19 (1) (f).

We have carefully considered the weighty pronouncements of the eminent Judges who gave shape to the concept that the extent of protection of important guarantees, such as the liberty of person, and right to property, depends upon the form and object of the State action, and not upon its direct operation upon the individual's freedom. But it is not the object of the authority making the law impairing the right of a citizen, nor the form of action taken that determines the protection he can claim: it is the effect of the law and of the action upon the right which attract the jurisdiction of the Court to grant relief. If this be the true view, and we think it is, in determining the impact of State action upon constitutional guarantees which are fundamental, it follows that the extent of protection against impairment of a fundamental right is determined not by the object of the Legislature nor by the form of the action, but by its direct operation upon the individuals rights.

We are of the view that the theory that the object and form of the State action determine the extent of protection which the aggrieved party may claim is not consistent with the constitutional scheme. Each freedom has different dimensions. Article 19 (1) (f) enunciates the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property: clause (5) of Article 19 authorizes imposition of restrictions upon the right. Article 31 assures the right to property and grants protection against the exercise of the authority of the State. Clause (5) of Article 19 and clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 prescribe restrictions upon State action, subject to which the right to property may be exercised. Article 19 (5) is a broad generalization dealing with the nature of limitations which may be placed by law on the right to property. The guarantees under Articles 31 (1) and (2) arise out of the limitations imposed on the authority of the State by law to take over the individual's property. The true character of the limitations under the two provisions is not different. Clause (5) of Article 19 and clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 are parts of a single pattern. Article 19 (1) (f) enunciates the basic right to property of the citizens and Article 19 (5) and clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 deal with limitations which may be placed by law, subject to which the rights may be exercised.

Limitations prescribed for ensuring due exercise of the authority of the State to deprive a person of his property and of the power to compulsorily acquire his property are, therefore, specific classes of limitations on the right to property falling within Article 19 (1) (f). Property may be compulsorily acquired only for a public purpose. Where the law provides for compulsory acquisition of property for a public purpose it may be presumed that the acquisition or the law relating thereto imposes a reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public. If there is no public purpose to sustain compulsory acquisition, the law violates Article 31 (2). If the acquisition is for a public purpose, substantive reasonableness of the restriction which includes deprivation may, unless otherwise established, be presumed, but enquiry into reasonableness of the procedural provisions will not be excluded. For instance if a tribunal is authorised by an Act to determine compensation for property compulsorily acquired, without hearing the owner of the property, the Act would be liable to be struck down under Article 19 (1) (f).

1. (1955) 1 S.C.R. 777 : (1955) S.C.J. 10.

2. (1961) 2 S.C.J. 443.

3. (1968) 3 S.C.R. 489 : (1968) 2 S.C.J. 760 : A.I.R. 1968 S.C. 1053.

In dealing with the argument that Article 31 (2) is a complete code relating to infringement of the right to property by compulsory acquisition, and the validity of the law is not liable to be tested in the light of the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed thereby, it is necessary to bear in mind the enunciation of the guarantee of fundamental rights which has taken different forms. In some cases it is an express declaration of a guaranteed right : Articles 29 (1), 30 (1), 26, 25 and 32 ; in others to ensure protection of individual rights they take specific forms of restrictions on State action—legislative or executive—Articles 14, 15, 16, 20, 21, 22 (1), 27 and 28 ; in some others, it takes the form of a positive declaration and simultaneously enunciates the restriction thereon : Articles 19 (1) and 19 (2) to (6) ; in some cases, it arises as an implication from the delimitation of the authority of the State, e.g. Articles 31 (1) and 31 (2); in still others, it takes the form of a general prohibition against the State as well as others : Article 17, 23 and 24. The enunciation of rights either express or by implication does not follow a uniform pattern. But one thread runs through them : they seek to protect the rights of the individual or a groups of individuals against infringement of those rights within specific limits. Part III of the Constitution weaves a pattern of guarantees on the texture of basic human rights. The guarantees delimit the protection of those rights in their allotted fields; they do not attempt to enunciate distinct rights.

We are therefore unable to hold that the challenge to the validity of the provision for acquisition is liable to be tested only on the ground of non-compliance with Article 31 (2). Article 31 (2) requires that property must be acquired for a public purpose and that it must be acquired under a law with characteristics set out in that Article. Formal compliance with the conditions under Article 31 (2) is not sufficient to negate the protection of the guarantee of the right to property. Acquisition must be under the authority of a law and the expression "law" means a law which is within the competence of the Legislature, and does not impair the guarantee of the rights in Part III. We are unable, therefore, to agree that Articles 19 (1) (f) and 31 (2) are mutually exclusive.

The area of protection afforded against State action by the freedom under Article 19 (1) (f) and by the exercise of the power of the State to acquire property of the individual without his consent must still be reconciled. If property is compulsorily acquired for a public purpose, and the law satisfies the requirements of Articles 31 (2) and 31 (2-A), the Court may readily presume that by the acquisition a reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right to hold property is imposed in the interests of the general public. But that is not because the claim to plead infringement of the fundamental right under Article 19 (1) (f) does not avail the owner ; it is because the acquisition imposes a permissible restriction on the right of the owner of the property compulsorily acquired.

We have found it necessary to examine the rationale of the two lines of authority and determine whether there is anything in the Constitution which justifies this apparently inconsistent development of the law. In our judgment, the assumption in *A.K. Gopalan's case*¹, that certain Articles in the Constitution exclusively deal with specific matters and in determining whether there is infringement of the individual's guaranteed rights, the object and the form of the State action alone need be considered, and effect of the laws on fundamental rights of the individuals in general will be ignored cannot be accepted as correct. We hold that the validity of "law" which authorises deprivation of property and "a law" which authorises compulsory acquisition of property for a public purpose must be adjudged by the application of the same tests. A citizen may claim in an appropriate case that the law authorising compulsory acquisition of property imposes fetters upon his right to hold property which are not reasonable restrictions in the interests of the general public. It is immaterial that the scope for such challenge may be attenuated because of the nature of the law of acquisition which providing as it does for expropriation of property of the individual for public purpose may be presumed to impose reasonable restrictions in the interests of the general public.

Whether the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of Act XXII of 1969 and the other related provisions of the Act impair the fundamental freedoms under Article 19 (1) (f) and (g) now falls to be considered. By section 4 the entire undertaking of each named bank vests in the Union, and the bank is prohibited from engaging in the business of banking in India and even in a foreign country, except where by the laws of a foreign country banking business owned or controlled by Government cannot be carried on, the named bank will be entitled to continue the business in that country. The business which the named banks carried on was—(1) the business of banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, and business incidental thereto; and (2) other business which by virtue of section 6 (1) they were not prohibited from carrying on, though not part of or incidental to the business of banking. It may be recalled that by Act XXII of 1969 the named banks cannot engage in business of banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, but may engage in other forms of business. By the Act, however, the entire undertaking of each named bank is vested in the new corporation set up with a name identical with the name of that bank, and authorised to carry on banking business previously carried on by the named bank, and its managerial and other staff is transferred to the corresponding new bank. The newly constituted corresponding bank is entitled to engage in business described in section 6 (1) of the Banking Regulation Act, and for that purpose to utilize the assets, goodwill and business connections of the existing bank.

The named banks are declared entitled to engage in business other than banking: but they have no assets with which that business may be carried on, and since they are prohibited from carrying on banking business, by virtue of section 7 of the Reserve Bank of India Act, they cannot use in their title the words "Bank", or "Banking" and even engage in "non-banking business" in their old names. A business organization deprived of its entire assets and undertaking, its managerial and other staff, its premises, and its name, even if it has a theoretical right to carry on non-banking business, would not be able to do so especially when even the fraction of the value of its undertaking made payable to it as compensation is not made immediately payable to it.

Validity of the provisions of the Act which transfer the undertaking of the named banks and prohibit those banks from carrying on business of banking and practically prohibit them from carrying on non-banking business falls to be considered in the light of Article 19 (1) (f) and Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution. By Article 19 (1) (f) right to acquire, hold and dispose of property is guaranteed to the citizens and by Article 19 (1) (g) the right to practise any profession or to carry on any occupation, trade or business is guaranteed to the citizens. These rights are not absolute: they are subject to the restrictions prescribed in the appropriate clause) of Article 19. By clause (5) it is provided, inter alia, that nothing in sub-cl. (f) of clause (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law in so far as it imposes, or prevent the State from making any law, imposing in the interests of the general public, reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by that sub-clause either in the interests of the general public or for the protection of the interests of any Scheduled Tribe. Clause (6) as amended by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, reads :

“ Nothing in sub-clause (g) of the said clause shall affect the operation of any existing law in so far as it imposes, or prevent the State from making any law imposing, in the interests of the general public, reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by the said sub-clause, and in particular nothing in the said sub-clause shall affect the operation of any existing law in so far as it relates to, or prevent the State from making law relating to—

(i) the professional or technical qualifications necessary for practising any profession or carrying on any occupation, trade or business, or

(ii) the carrying on by the State or by a corporation owned or controlled by the State, of any trade, business, industry or service, whether to the exclusion, complete or partial, of citizens or otherwise.”

Clause (6) of Article 19 consists of two parts: (1) the right declared by sub-clause (g) is not protected against the operation of any law imposing, in the interests of the general public, reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by that sub-clause ; and (2) in particular sub-clause (g) does not affect the operation of any law relating, inter alia, to carrying on by the State or by a corporation owned or controlled by the State, of any trade, business, industry or service, whether or not such law provides for the exclusion, complete or partial, of citizens.

According to Mr. Palkhivala it was intended by the use of the expression “ in particular ”, to denote a special class of trade, business, industry or service out of the general class referred to in the first part, and on that account a law which relates to the carrying on by the State of any particular business, industry or service, to the exclusion—complete or partial—of citizens or otherwise, is also subject to the enquiry whether it imposes reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right in the interests of the general public. Counsel urged that the law imposing restrictions upon the exercise of the right to carry on any occupation, trade or business is subject to the test of reasonable restrictions imposed in the interests of the general public, likewise, the particular classes specified in the second part of the Article must also be regarded as liable to be tested in the light of the same limitations. Counsel strongly relied upon the decision of the House of Lords in *Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government and another*¹. The House of Lords in that case did not lay down any general proposition. They were only dealing with the meaning of the words “ in particular ” in the context in which they occurred, and it was held that the expression “ in particular ” was not intended to confer a separate and distinct power wholly independent of that contained in the first limb. It cannot be said that the expression “ in particular ” used in Article 19 (1) (g) is intended either to particularise or to illustrate the general law set out in the first limb.

It was observed in *Saghir Ahmed v. The State of U.P. and others*², by Mukherjea, J., at page 727 :

“ The new clause—Article 19 (6)—has no doubt been introduced with a view to provide that a State can create a monopoly in its own favour in respect of any trade or business ; but the amendment does not make the establishment of such monopoly a reasonable restriction within the meaning of the first clause of Article 19 (6). The result of the amendment is that the State would not have to justify such action as reasonable at all in a Court of law, and no objection could be taken to it on the ground that it is an infringement of the rights guaranteed under Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution.”

In dealing with the validity of a law creating a State monopoly in *Akadasi Padhan v. State of Orissa*¹, this Court unanimously held, that the validity of a law creating a State monopoly which "indirectly impinges on any other right" cannot be challenged on the ground that it imposes restrictions which are not reasonable restrictions in the interests of the general public. But if the law contains other incidental provisions which do not constitute an essential and integral part of the monopoly created by it, the validity of those provisions is liable to be tested under the first part of Article 19 (6). If they directly impair any other fundamental right guaranteed by Article 19 (1), the validity of those provisions will be tested by reference to the corresponding clauses of Article 19. The Court also observed that the essential attributes of the law creating a monopoly will vary with the nature of the trade or business in which the monopoly is created. They will depend upon the nature of the commodity, the nature of trade in which it is involved and other circumstances. At page 707, Gajendragadkar, J., speaking for the Court, observed:

"A law relating to a State monopoly cannot, in the context, include all the provisions contained in the said law whether they have direct relation with the creation of the monopoly or not. In our opinion, the said expression should be construed to mean the law relating to the monopoly in its absolutely essential features. If a law is passed creating a State monopoly, the Court should enquire what are the provisions of the said law which are basically and essentially necessary for creating the State monopoly. It is only those essential and basic provisions which are protected by the latter part of Article 19 (6). If there are other provisions made by the Act which are subsidiary, incidental or helpful to the operation of the monopoly, they do not fall under the first part of Article 19 (6)." He also observed at page 705 :

"....the amendment (First Amendment) clearly indicates that State monopoly in respect of any trade or business must be presumed to be reasonable and in the interests of general public, so far as Article 19 (1) (g) is concerned."

This was reiterated in *Rasbihari Parida and others v. The State of Orissa*², *M/s. Vrajilal Manilal & Co. and another v. The State of Madhya Pradesh and others*³; and *Municipal Committee, Amritsar and others v. State of Punjab and others*⁴. These cases dealt with the validity of laws creating monopolies in the State. Clause (6) is however not restricted to laws creating State monopolies, and the rule enunciated in *Akadasi Padhan's case*¹, applies to all laws relating to the carrying on by the State of any trade, business, industry or service by Article 298 the State is authorized to carry on trade which is competitive, or excludes the citizens from that trade completely or partially. The "basic and essential" provisions of law which are "integrally and essentially connected" with the carrying on of a trade by the State will not be exposed to the challenge that they impair the guarantee under Article 19 (1) (g), whether the citizens are excluded completely or partially from carrying on that trade, or the trade is competitive. Imposition of restrictions which are incidental or subsidiary to the carrying on of trade by the State whether to the exclusion of the citizens or not must, however, satisfy the test of the main limb.

The law which prohibits after 19th July, 1969, the named banks from carrying on banking business, being a necessary incident of the right assumed by the Union, is not liable to be challenged because of Article 19 (6) (ii) in so far as it affects the right to carry on business.

There is no satisfactory proof in support of the plea that the enactment of Act XXII of 1969 was not in the larger interest of the nation, but to serve political ends, i.e. not with the object to ensure better banking facilities, or to make them available to a wider public, but only to take control over the deposits of the public with the major banks, and to use them as a political lever against industrialists who had built up industries by decades of industrial planning and careful management. It is true that social control legislation enacted by the Banking Laws (Amendment) Act LVIII of 1968 was in operation and the named banks were subject to rigorous control which the Reserve Bank was competent to exercise and did in fact exercise. Granting that the objectives laid down by the Reserve Bank were being carried out, it cannot be said that the Act was enacted in abuse of legislative power. Our attention was invited to a mass of evidence from the speeches of the Deputy Prime Minister, and of the Governor and the Deputy Governor of the Reserve Bank, and also extracts from the Reserve Bank Bulletins issued from time to time and other statistical information collected from official sources in support of the thesis of the petitioner that the performance of the named banks exceeded the targets laid down by the Reserve Bank in its directives; that the named banks had effectively complied with the requirements of the law; that they had served the diverse interests including small-scale sector, and had been instrumental in bringing about an increasing tempo of industrial and commercial activity, that they had discouraged speculative holding of commodities; and had followed essential priorities in the economic development of the nation coupled with a vigorous programme of branch development in the rural sector, bringing about a considerable expansion in deposits, and large advances to the small-scale business and industry. Mr. Palkhivala urged that under the scheme of social control the commercial banks had achieved impressive results comparing favourably with the performance of the State Bank of India and its subsidiaries in the public sector, and that the performance of the named banks could not be belittled by referring to the banking structure and development in highly developed countries like Canada, Japan, France, United States and the United Kingdom. On the other hand, the Attorney-General said that the commercial banks followed a conservative policy because they had to look primarily to the interests of the shareholders, and on that account could not adopt bold policies or schemes for financing the needy and worthy causes; that if the resources of the banking industry are properly utilised for the weaker sections of the people economic regeneration of the nation may be speedily achieved, that 28 per cent of the towns in India were not served by commercial banks that there had been unequal development of facilities in different parts of the country and deserving sections were deprived of the benefit of important national resources resulting in economic disparities, especially because the major banks catered to the large-scale industries.

This Court is not the forum in which these conflicting claims may be debated. Whether there is a genuine need for banking facility in the rural areas, whether certain classes of the community are deprived of the benefit of the resources of the banking industry, whether administration by the Government of the commercial banking sector will not prove beneficial to the community and will lead to rigidity in the administration, whether the Government administration will eschew the profit-motive, and even if it be eschewed, there will accrue substantial benefits to the public, whether an undue accent on banking as a means of social regenerations, especially in the backward areas, is a doctrinaire approach to a rational order of priorities for attaining the national objectives enshrined in our Constitution, and whether the policy followed by the Government in office or the policy propounded by its opponents may reasonably attain the national objectives are matters which have little relevance in determining the legality of the measure. It is again not for this Court to consider the relative merits of the different political theories or economic policies. The Parliament has under Entry 45, List I the power to legislate in respect of banking and other commercial activities of the named banks necessarily incidental thereto; it has the power to legislate for acquiring the undertaking of the the named banks under Entry 42, List III. Whether by the exercise of the power vested in the Reserve Bank under the pre-existing laws, results could be achieved which it is the object of the Act to achieve, is, in our judgment, not relevant in considering whether the Act amounts to abuse of legislative power. This Court has the power to strike down a law on the ground of want of authority, but the Court will not sit in appeal over the policy of the Parliament in enacting a law. The Court cannot find fault with the Act merely on the ground that it is inadvisable to take over the undertaking of banks which, it is said by the petitioner, by thrift and efficient management had set up an impressive and efficient business organization serving large sectors of industry.

By section 15 (2) (e) of the Act the banks are entitled to engage in business other than banking. But by the provisions of the Act they are rendered practically incapable of engaging in any business. By the provisions of the Act, a named bank cannot even use its name, and the compensation which is to be given will, in the absence of agreement, be determined by the Tribunal and paid in securities which will mature not before ten years. A named bank may, if it agrees to distribute among the shareholders the compensation which it may receive, be paid in securities an amount equal to half the paid-up share capital, but obviously the fund will not be available to the Bank. It is true that under section 15 (3) of the Act the Central Government may authorise the corresponding new banks to make advances to the named banks for any of the purposes mentioned in section 15 (2). But that is a matter which rests only upon the will of the Central Government and no right can be founded upon it.

Where restrictions imposed upon the carrying on of a business are so stringent that the business cannot in practice be carried on, the Court will regard the imposition of the restrictions as unreasonable. In *Mohammad Yasin v. The Town Area Committee, Jalalabad and another*¹, this Court observed that under Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution a citizen has the right to carry on any occupation, trade or business and the only restriction on this right is the authority of the State to make a law relating to the carrying on of such occupation, trade or business as mentioned in clause (6) of that Article as amended by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951. In *Mohammad Yasin's case*¹, by the bye-laws of the Municipal Committee, it was provided that no person shall sell or purchase any vegetables or fruit within the limits of the municipal area of Jalalabad, wholesale or by auction, without paying the prescribed fee. It was urged on behalf of a wholesale dealer in vegetables that although there was no prohibition against carrying on business in vegetables by anybody, in effect the bye-laws brought about a total stoppage of the wholesaler's business in a commercial sense, for, he had to pay prescribed fee to the contractor, and under the bye-laws the wholesale dealer could not charge a higher rate of commission than the contractor. The wholesale dealer, therefore, could charge the growers of vegetables and fruit only the commission permissible under the bye-laws, and he had to make over the entire commission to the contractor without retaining any part thereof. The wholesale dealer was thereby converted into a mere tax-collector for the contractor or the Town Area Committee without any remuneration. The bye-laws in this situation were struck down as impairing the freedom to carry on business.

In *Dwarkanadas Shrinivas's case*², the Sholarpur Spinning and Weaving Company (Emergency Provisions) Ordinance II of 1950 and Act (XXVIII of 1950) passed by the Parliament to replace the Ordinance were challenged. Under the Ordinance the managing agent and the selected directors were dismissed and new directors were appointed by the State. The company was denuded of possession of its property and all that was left to the company was a bare legal title. In an appeal arising out of a suit challenging the validity of the Ordinance and the Act which replaced it, this Court held that the Ordinance and the Act violated the fundamental rights of the company and of the plaintiff a preference shareholder upon whom a demand was made for payment of unpaid calls. This Court held that the Ordinance and the Act in effect deprived the company of its property within the meaning of Article 31 without compensation. It was observed by Mahajan, J., that practically all incidents of ownership were taken over by the State and nothing was left with the company but the mere husk of title, and on that account the impugned statute had overstepped the limits of legitimate social control legislation.

If compensation paid is in such a form that it is not immediately available for restarting any business, declaration of the right to carry on business other than banking becomes an empty formality, when the entire undertaking of the named banks is transferred to and vests in the new banks together with the premises and the names of the banks, and the named banks are deprived of the services of its administrative and other staff.

The restriction imposed upon the right of the named banks to carry on "non-banking" business is, in our judgment, plainly unreasonable. No attempt is made to support the Act which while theoretically declaring the right of the named banks to carry on "non-banking" business makes it impossible in a commercial sense for the banks to carry on any business.

Protection of Article 14—

By Article 14 of the Constitution the State is enjoined not to deny any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. The Article forbids class legislation, but not reasonable classification in making laws. The test of permissible classification under an Act lies in two cumulative conditions, (a) classification under the Act must be founded on an intelligible differentia distinguishing persons, transactions or things grouped together from others left out of the group; and (ii) the differentia has a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Act; there must be a nexus between the basis of classification and the object of the Act; *Chiranjit Lal Chowdhary's case*¹, *The State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara*²; *The State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar*³, *Budhan Choudhry and others v. The State of Bihar*⁴; *Shri Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Shri Justice S. R. Tendolkar and others*⁵; and *State of Rajasthan v. Mulkarchand and others*⁶.

The Courts recognize in the Legislature some degree of elasticity in the matter of making a classification between persons, objects and transactions. Provided the classification is based on some intelligible ground, the Courts will not strike down that classification, because in the view of the Court it should have proceeded on some other ground or should have included the class selected for special treatment some other persons, objects or transactions which are not included by the Legislature. The Legislature is free to recognize the degree of harm and to restrict the operation of a law only to those cases where the need is the clearest. The Legislature need not extend the regulation of a law to all cases it may possibly reach, and may make a classification founded on practical grounds of convenience. Classification to be valid must, however, disclose a rational nexus with the object sought to be achieved by the law which makes the classification. Validity of a classification will be upheld only if that test is independently satisfied. The Court in examining the validity of a statute challenged as infringing the equality clause makes an assumption that there is a reasonable classification and that the classification has a rational relation to the object to be achieved by the statute.

But the definition of "existing bank" in section 2 (d) of the Act, fourteen named banks in the First Schedule are, out of many commercial banks engaged in the business of banking, selected for special treatment, in that the undertaking of the named banks is taken over, they are prevented from carrying on in India and abroad banking business and the Act operates in practice to prevent those banks engaging in business other than banking.

By reason of the transfer of the undertaking of the named banks, the interests of the banks and the shareholders are vitally affected. Investment in bank-share is regarded in India, especially in the shares of larger banks, as a safe investment on attractive terms with a steady return and fluidity of conversion. Mr. Palkhivala has handed in a treatment setting out the percentage return of dividends on market:

rates in 1968. The rate works out at more than 10 per cent. in the case of the shares of Bank of Baroda, Central Bank of India, Dena Bank, Indian Bank, United Bank and United Commercial Bank, and at more than 9 per cent in the case of shares of Bank of India, Bank of Maharashtra, Canara Bank, Indian Bank, Indian Overseas Bank and United Bank of India. In the case of Allahabad Bank it worked out at 5 per cent, and in the case of shares of Punjab National Bank and Syndicate Bank the rates are not available. This statement is not challenged. Since the taking over of the undertaking, there has resulted a steep fall in the ruling market quotations of the shares of a majority of the named banks. The market quotations have slumped to less than 50 per cent in the case of Bank of India, Central Bank, Bank of Baroda and even at the quoted rates probably there are no transactions. Dividend may no longer be distributed, for the banks have no liquid assets and they are not engaged in any commercial activity. It may take many years before the compensation payable to the banks may even be finalised, and be available to the named banks for utilising it in any commercial venture open to the banks under the Act. Under the scheme of determination of compensation, the total amount payable to the banks will be a fraction of the value of their net assets, and that compensation will not be available to the banks immediately.

The ground for selection of the 14 banks is that those banks held deposits, as shown in the return as on the last Friday of June, 1969 furnished to the Reserve Bank under section 27 of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, of not less than rupees fifty crores.

The object of Act XXII of 1969 is according to the long title to provide for the acquisition and transfer of the undertakings of certain banking companies in order to serve better the needs of development of the economy in conformity with the national policy and objectives and matters connected therewith or incidental thereto. The national policy may reasonably be taken to be policy contained in the directive principles of State policy, especially Articles 38 and 39 of the Constitution. For achieving the needs of a developing economy in conformity with the national policy and objectives the resources of all the banks—foreign as well as Indian—are inadequate. Of the total deposits with commercial banks 27 per cent. are with the State Bank of India and its subsidiaries; the named commercial banks of which the undertaking is taken over hold approximately 56 per cent. of the deposits. The remaining 17 per cent of the deposits are shared by the foreign banks and the other scheduled and non-scheduled commercial banks. 83 per cent. of the total resources may obviously not meet wholly or even substantially the needs of development of the economy.

In support of the plea that there is a reasonable relation between the differentia—ground for making the distinction between the named banks and the other banks—Indian and foreign—and the object of the Act, it is urged that the policy of the Union is to control the concentration of private economic resources to ensure achievement of the directive principles of State policy, and for that purpose, selection has been made “with an eye, inter alia, to the magnitude and concentrations of the economic resources of such enterprises for inclusion in such law as would be essential or substantially conducive to the achievement of the national objectives and policy”. It is apparently claimed that the object of the Government—not of the statute—is to acquire ultimately all banking institutions, but the 14 named banks are selected for acquisition because they have “Larger business and wider coverage” in comparison with other bank not selected, and had also larger organization, better managerial resources and employees better trained and equipped. These are primarily grounds for classification and not for explaining the relation between the classification and the object of the Act. But in the absence of any reliable data, we do not think it necessary to express an opinion on the question whether selection of the undertaking of some out of many banking institutions, for compulsory acquisition, is liable to be struck down as hostile discrimination, on the ground that there is no reasonable relation between the differentia and the object of the Act which cannot be substantially served even by the acquisition of the undertakings of all the banks out of which the selection is made.

It is claimed that the depositor with the named banks have also a grievance. Those depositors who had made long-term deposits, taking into account the confidence they had in the management of the banks and the service they rendered, are now called upon to trust the management of a statutory corporation not selected by them, without an opportunity of being placed in the same position in which they would have been if they were permitted to transfer their deposits elsewhere. The argument is based on several imponderables and does not require any detailed consideration.

But two other grounds in support of the plea of impairment of the guarantee of equality clause require to be noticed. The fourteen named banks are prohibited from carrying on banking business—a disability for which there is no rational explanation. Banks other than the named banks may carry on banking business in India and abroad: new banks may be floated for carrying on banking business, but the named banks are prohibited from carrying on banking business. Each named bank had, even as claimed on behalf of the Union, by its superior management established an extensive business organization, and each bank had deposits exceeding Rs. 50 crores. The undertakings of the banks are taken over and they are prohibited from doing banking business. In the affidavit filed on behalf of the Union no serious attempt is made to explain why the named banks should be specially selected for being subjected to this disability.

The petitioner also contended that the classification is made on a wholly irrational ground, viz. penalizing efficiency and good management, for the major fourteen banks had made a sustained effort and had exceeded the Reserve Bank target and had fully complied with the directives under the social control legislation. This, it is said, is a reversal of the policy underlying section 36-A of the Banking Regulation Act under which inefficient and recalcitrant banks are contemplated to be taken over by the Government. We need express no opinion on this part of the argument. But the petitioner is on firm ground in contending that when after acquiring the assets, undertaking organization, goodwill and the names of the named banks they are prohibited from carrying on banking business, where as other banks—Indian as well as foreign—are permitted to carry on banking business, a flagrantly hostile discrimination is practised. Section 15 (2) of the Act which by the clearest implication prohibits the named banks from carrying on banking business is, therefore, liable to be struck down. It is immaterial whether the entire sub-section (2) is struck down, or as suggested by the Attorney-General that only the words “other than the business of banking” in section 15 (2) (e) be struck down. Again, in considering the validity of a section 15 (2) (e) in its relation to the guarantee of freedom to carry on business other than banking, we have already pointed out that the named banks are also, (though theoretically competent) in substance prohibited from carrying on non-banking business. For reasons set out by us for holding that the restriction is unreasonable, it must also be held that the guarantee of equality is impaired by preventing the named banks carrying on the non-banking business.

Protection of the guarantee under Article 31 (2)—

The guarantee under Article 31 (2) arises directly out of the restrictions imposed upon the power of the State to acquire private property, without the consent of the owner for a public purpose. Upon the exercise of the power to acquire or requisition property, by clause (2) two restrictions are placed: (a) power to acquire shall not be exercised save for a public purpose; and (b) that it shall not be exercised save by authority of a law which provides for compensation for the property acquired or requisitioned, and fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined and given. Sub-clause (2-A) in substance provides a definition of “compulsory acquisition or requisitioning of property.” Existence of a public purpose and provision for giving compensation for compulsory acquisition of property of an individual are conditions of the exercise of the power. If either condition be absent, the guarantee under Article 31 (2) is impaired, and the law providing for acquisition will be invalid. But jurisdiction of the Court to question the law on the ground that compensation provided thereby is not adequate is, expressly excluded.

In the case before us we need not express any opinion on the question whether a composite undertaking of two or more distinct lines of business may be acquired where there is a public purpose for acquisition of the assets of one or more lines of business, but not in respect of all the lines of business. As we have already observed, there is no evidence that the named banks carried on non-banking business, distinct from banking business, and in respect of such non-banking business the banks owned distinct assets apart from the assets of the banking business.

The law providing for acquisition must again either fix the amount of compensation or specify the principles on which, and the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined and given. The owner whose property is compulsorily acquired is guaranteed the right to receive compensation and the amount of compensation must either be fixed by the law or be determined according to the principles and in the manner specified by the law. The law which does not ensure the guarantee will, except where the grievance only is that the compensation provided by the law is inadequate, be declared void.

The petitioner says that the expression "compensation" means a "just equivalent" in money of the property acquired and that the law providing for compulsory acquisition must "aim" at a just equivalent to the expropriated owner: If the law so aims at, it will not be deemed to impair the guarantee merely on the ground that the compensation paid to the owner is inadequate. The Attorney-General on the other hand says that "compensation" in Article 31 (2) does not mean a just equivalent, and it is not predicated of the validity of a law relating to compulsory acquisition that it must aim at awarding a just equivalent, for, if the law is not confiscatory, or the principles for determination of compensation are not irrelevant, "the Courts cannot go into the propriety of such principles or adequacy or reasonableness of the compensation."

Two questions immediately arise for determination. What is the true meaning of the expression "compensation" as used in Article 31 (2), and what is the extent of the jurisdiction of the Court when the validity of a law providing for compulsory acquisition of property for a public purpose is challenged?"

In its dictionary meaning "compensation" means anything given to make things equal in value: anything given as an acquivalent, to make amends for loss or damage. In all States where the rule of law prevails, the right to compensation is guaranteed by the Constitution or regarded as inextricably involved in the right to property.

By the 5th Amendment in the Constitution of the U.S.A. the right of eminent domain is expressly circumscribed by providing "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." Such a provision is to be found also in every State Constitution in the United States: Lewis Eminent Domain, 3rd edition. (pages 28-50). The Japanese Constitution, 1946, by Article 25 provides a similar guarantee. Under the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution, 1900, the Commonwealth Parliament is invested with the power of acquisition of property on "just terms": section 57 (XXXI).

Under the Common Law of England, principles for payment compensation for acquisition of property by the State are stated by Blackstone in his "Commentaries on the Laws of England," 4th edition, Vol. 1, at page 109:

"So great moreover is the regard of the law for private property, that it will not authorise the least violation of it; no, not even for the general good of the whole community. * * * Besides, the public good is in nothing more essentially interested, than in the protection of every individual's private rights, as modelled by the municipal law. In this and similar cases the Legislature alone can, and indeed frequently does, interpose, and compel the individual to acquiesce. But how does it interpose and compel? Not by absolutely stripping the subject of his property in an arbitrary manner; but giving him a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The public is now considered as an individual, treating with an individual for an exchange. All that the Legislature does, is to oblige the owner to alienate his possession for a reasonable price:

* * *

The British Parliament is supreme and its powers are not subject to any constitutional limitations. But the British Parliament has rarely, if at all, exercised power to take property without payment of the cash value of the property taken. In Attorney-General v. De Keyser's Royal Hotel,¹ the House of Lords held that the Crown is not entitled as of right either by virtue of its prerogative or under any statute, to take possession of the land or building of a subject for administrative purposes in connection with the defence of the realm, without compensation for their use and occupation.

Under the Government of India Act, 1935, by section 299 (2) it was enacted that:

"Neither the Federal or a Provincial Legislature shall have power to make any law authorising the compulsory acquisition for public purposes of any land, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in, or in any company owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking, unless the law provides for the payment of compensation for the property acquired and either fixes the amount of the compensation or specifies the principles on which, and the manner in which, it is to be determined."

Article 31 (2) before it was amended by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, followed substantially the same pattern.

Prior to the amendment of Article 31 (2) this Court interpreted the expression "compensation" as meaning "full indemnification". Patanjali Sastri, C.J., in *The State of West Bengal v. Mrs. Bela Banerjee and others*², in interpreting the guarantee under Article 31 (2) speaking on behalf of the Court, observed:

"While it is true that the Legislature is given the discretionary powers of laying down the principles which should govern the determination of the amount to be given to the owner for the property appropriated, such principles must ensure that what is determined as payable must be compensation, that is, a just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of. Within the limits of this basic requirement of full indemnification of the expropriated owner, the Constitution allows free play to the legislative judgment as to what principles should guide the determination of the amount payable. Whether such principles take into account all the elements which make up the true value of the property appropriated and exclude matters which are to be neglected, is a justiciable issue to be adjudicated by the Court."

In the view of the learned Chief Justice the expression "just equivalent" meant "full indemnification" and the expropriated owner was on that account entitled to the market value of the property on the date of deprivation of the property. This case was decided under a statute enacted before the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955. The principle of that case was approved in *A. B. Jeejeebhoy v. Assistant Collector, Thana Prant, Thana*³, a case under the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1948, and invoking the guarantee under section 299 (2) of the Government of India Act, 1935; in Union of India v. Kamalabai Harjiwandas

Article 31 (2) was amended with effect from 27th April, 1955, by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955. By sub-clause (2-A) a definition of acquisition or requisitioning of properties was supplied and certain other formal changes were also made, with the important reservation that "no such law shall be called in question in any Court on the ground that the compensation provided by that law is not adequate." In cases arising under statutes enacted after 27th April, 1955, this Court held that the expression "compensation" in Article 31 (2) as amended continued to mean "just equivalent" as under the unamended clause: *P. Vajravelu Mudaliar v. Special Deputy Collector, Madras and another*³, under the Land Acquisition (Madras Amendment) Act (XXIII of 1961); *Union of India v. The Metal Corporation of India Ltd and the other*⁴, under the Metal Corporation of India (Acquisition of Undertakings) Act (LIV of 1955); *Lachhman Dass and others v. Municipal Committee, Jalalabad*⁵, under section 20-B of the Displaced Persons (Corporation and Rehabilitation) Act, 1954, as amended by Act (II of 1960). In *Ranojirao Shinde's case*⁶, dealing with a case under the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Cash Grants Act (XVI of 1963) it was observed that the compensation referred to in Article 31 (2) is a just equivalent of the value of the property taken. But this Court in *State of Gujarat v. Shantilal Mangaldas and others*⁷, observed that compensation payable for compulsory acquisition of property is not, by the application of any principles, determinable as a precise sum, and by calling it a "just" or "fair" equivalent, no definiteness could be attached thereto; that valuation of lands, buildings and incorporeal right has to be made on the application of different principles, e.g., capitalization of net income at appropriate rates, reinstatement, determination of original value reduced by depreciation break-up value of properties which had outgrown their utility; that the rules relating to determination of value of lands, buildings, machinery and other classes of property differ, and the application of several methods or principles lead to widely divergent amounts, and since compensation is not capable of precise determination by the application of recognized rules, by qualifying the expression "compensation" by the adjective "just" the determination was made more controversial. It was observed that the Parliament amended the Constitution by the Fourth Amendment Act declaring that adequacy of compensation fixed by the Legislature as amended according to the principles specified by the Legislature for determination will not be justiciable. It was then observed that:

"The right declared by the Constitution guarantees that compensation shall be given before a person is compulsorily expropriated of his property for a public purpose. What is fixed as compensation by statute, or by the application of principles specified for determination of compensation is guaranteed; it does not mean, however, that something fixed or determined by the application of specified principles which is illusory or can in no sense be regarded as compensation must be upheld by the Courts, for, to do so, would be to grant charter of arbitrariness, and permit a device to defeat the constitutional guarantee. But compensation fixed or determined on principles specified by the Legislature cannot be permitted to be challenged on the somewhat indefinite plea that it is not a just or fair equivalent. Principles may be challenged on the ground that they are irrelevant to the determination of compensation, but not on the plea that what is awarded as a result of the application of those principles is not just or fair compensation. A challenge to a statute that the principles specified by it do not award a just equivalent will be in clear violation of the constitutional declaration that inadequacy of compensation provided is not justiciable."

This Court held in *Mrs. Bela Banerjee's case*¹, that by the guarantee of the right to compensation for compulsory acquisition under Article 31 (2), before it was amended by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, the owner was entitled to receive a "just equivalent" or "full indemnification." In *P. Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*², this Court held that notwithstanding the amendment of Article 31 (2) by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, and even after the addition of the words "and no such law shall be called in question in any Court on the ground that the compensation provided by that law is not adequate," the expression "compensation", occurring in Article 31 (2) after the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act continued to have the same meaning as it had in section 299 (2) of the Government of India Act, 1935, and Article 31 (2) before it was amended, viz., "just equivalent" or "full indemnification."

There was apparently no dispute that Article 31 (2) before and after it was amended guaranteed a right to compensation for compulsory acquisition of property and that by giving to the owner, for compulsory acquisition of his property, compensation which was illusory, or determined by the application of principles which were irrelevant, the constitutional guarantee of compensation was not complied with. There was difference of opinion on one matter between the decisions in *P. Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*², and *Shantilal Mangaldas's case*³. In the former case it was observed that the constitutional guarantee was satisfied only if a just equivalent of the property was given to the owner: in the latter case it was held that "compensation" being itself incapable of any precise determination, no definite connotation could be attached thereto by calling it "just equivalent" or "full indemnification," and under Acts enacted after the amendment of Article 31 (2) it is not open to the Court to call in question the law providing for compensation on the ground that it is inadequate, whether the amount of compensation is fixed by the law or is to be determined according to principles specified therein. It was observed in the judgment in *Shantilal Mangaldas's case*³, at page 651:

"Whatever may have been the meaning of the expression 'compensation' under the unamended Article 31 (2), when the Parliament has expressly enacted under the amended clause that 'no such law shall be called in question in any Court on the ground that the compensation provided by that law is not adequate,' it was intended clearly to exclude from the jurisdiction of the Court an enquiry that what is fixed or determined by the application of the principles specified as compensation does not award to the owner a just equivalent of what he is deprived."

In *P. Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*², again the Court in dealing with the effect of the amendment observed (at page 627):

"Therefore, a more reasonable interpretation is that neither the principles prescribing the 'just equivalent' nor the 'just equivalent' can be questioned by the Court on the ground of the inadequacy of the compensation fixed or arrived at by the working of the principles. To illustrate, a law is made to acquire a house; its value at the time of acquisition has to be fixed; there are many modes of valuation, namely, estimate by an engideer, value reflected by comparable sales, capitalisation of rent and similar others. The application of different principles may lead to different results. The adoption of one principle may give a higher value and the adoption of another principle may given a lesser value. But nonetheless they are principles on which and the manner in which compensation is determined. The Court cannot obviously say that the law should have adopted one principle and not the other, for it relates only to the question of adequacy. On the other hand, if a law lays down principles which are not relevant to the property acquired, or to the value of the property at or about the time it is acquired, it may be said that they are not principles contemplated by Article 31 (2) of the Constitution."

The Court then applied that principle to the facts of the case and held that the Land Acquisition (Madras Amendment) Act, 1961, which provided that—(i) the owner of land acquired for housing shall get only the value of the land at the date of the notification under section 4 (1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, or an amount equivalent to the average market value of the land during the last five years immediately preceding such date, whichever was less; (ii) the owner shall get a solatium of only 5 per cent, and not 15 per cent, and (iii) in valuing the land acquired any increase in its suitability or adaptability for any use other than the use to which the land was put at the date of the notification under section 4 (1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, shall not be taken into consideration, did not impair the right to receive compensation. The Court observed at page 631:

"In awarding compensation if the potential value of the land is excluded, it cannot be said that the compensation awarded is the just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of. But such an exclusion only pertains to the method of ascertaining the compensation. One of the elements that should properly be taken into account in fixing the compensation is omitted: it results in the adequacy of the compensation, * * *. We, therefore, hold that the Amending Act does not offend Article 31 (2) of the Constitution."

The compensation provided by the Madras Act, according to the principles specified, was not the full market value at the date of acquisition. It did not amount to "full indemnification" of the owner; the Court still held that the law did not offend the guarantee under Article 31 (2) as amended, because the objection was only as to the adequacy of compensation. In *Shantilal Mangaldas's case*¹, the Court held that the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, Article 31 (2) guarantees a right to receive compensation for loss of property compulsorily acquired, but compensation does not mean a just equivalent of the property. If compensation is provided by law to be paid and the compensation is not illusory or is not determinable by the application of irrelevant principles, the law is not open to challenge on the ground that compensation fixed or determined to be paid is inadequate.

Both the lines of thought which converge in the ultimate result, support the view that the principle specified by the law for determination of compensation is beyond the pale of challenge, if it is relevant to the determination of compensation and is a recognised principle applicable in the determination of compensation for property compulsorily acquired and the principle is appropriate in determining the value of the class of property sought to be acquired. On the application of the view expressed in *P. Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*², or in *Shantilal Mangaldas's case*¹, the Act, in our judgment, is liable to be struck down as it fails to provide to the expropriated banks compensation determined according to relevant principles. Section 4 of the Act transfers the undertaking of every named bank to and vests it in the corresponding new bank. Section 6 (1) provides for payment of compensation for acquisition of the undertaking, and the compensation is to be determined in accordance with the principles specified in the Second Schedule. Section 6 (2) then provides that though separate valuations are made in respect of the several matters specified in Schedule II of the Act, the amount of compensation shall be deemed to be a single compensation. Compensation being the equivalent in terms of money of the property compulsorily acquired, the principle for determination of compensation is intended to award to the expropriated owner the value of the property acquired. The science of valuation of property recognizes several principles or methods for determining the value to be paid as compensation to the owner for loss of his property; there are different methods applicable to different classes of property in the determination of the value to be paid as recompense for loss of his property. A method appropriate to the determination of value of one class of property may be wholly inappropriate in determining the value of another class of property. If an appropriate method or principle for determination of compensation is applied, the fact that by the application of another principle which is also appropriate, a different value is reached, the Court will not be justified in entertaining the contention that out of the two appropriate methods, one more generous to the owner should have been applied by the Legislature.

1. (1969) 2 S.C.J. 322 : A.I.R. 1969 S.C. (S.C.) 173 : (1964) 2 M.L.J. (S.C.) 173 : (1965) 1 S.C.R. 614.

2. (1964) 2 S.C.J. 703 : (1964) 2 An.W.R.

We are unable to hold that a principle specified by the Parliament for determining compensation of the property to be acquired is conclusive. If that view be accepted, the Parliament will be invested with a charter of arbitrariness and by abuse of legislative process, the constitutional guarantee of the right to compensation may be severely impaired. The principle specified must be appropriate to the determination of compensation for the particular class of property sought to be acquired. If several principles are appropriate and one is selected for determination of the value of the property to be acquired, selection of that principle to the exclusion of other principles is not open to challenge, for the selection must be left to the wisdom of the Parliament.

The broad object underlying the principle of valuation is to award to the owner the equivalent of his property with its existing advantages and its potentialities. Where there is an established market for the property acquired, the problem of valuation presents little difficulty. Where there is no established market for the property, the object of the principle of valuation must be to pay to the owner for what he has lost, including the benefit of advantages present as well as future, without taking into account the urgency of acquisition, the disinclination of the owner to part with the property, and the benefit which the acquirer is likely to obtain by the acquisition. Under the Land Acquisition Acts compensation paid is the value to the owner together with all its potentialities and its special adaptability if the land is peculiarly suitable for a particular use, if it gives an enhanced value at the date of acquisition.

The important methods of determination of compensation are—(i) market value determined from sales of comparable properties, proximate in time to the date of acquisition, similarly situated, and possessing the same or similar advantages and subject to the same or similar disadvantages. Market value is the price the property may fetch in the open market if sold by a willing seller unaffected by the special needs of a particular purchase, (ii) capitalization of the net annual profit out of the property at a rate equal in normal cases to the return from gilt-edged securities. Ordinarily value of the property may be determined by capitalizing the net annual value obtainable in the market at the date of the notice of acquisition; (iii) where the property is a house, expenditure likely to be incurred for constructing a similar house, and reduced by the depreciation for the number of years since it was constructed; (iv) principle of reinstatement, where it is satisfactorily established that reinstatement in some other place is bona fide intended, there being no general market for the property for the purpose for which it is devoted (the purpose being a public purpose) and would have continued to be devoted, but for compulsory acquisition. Here compensation will be assessed on the basis of reasonable cost of reinstatement; (v) when the property has outgrown its utility and it is reasonably incapable of economic use, it may be valued as land plus the break-up value of the structure. But the fact that the acquirer does not intend to use the property for which it is used at the time of acquisition and desires to demolish it or use it for other purpose is irrelevant; and (vi) the property to be acquired has ordinarily to be valued as a unit. Normally an aggregate of the value of different components will not be the value of the unit.

These are, however, not the only methods. The method of determining the value of property by the application of an appropriate multiplier to the net annual income or profits is a satisfactory method of valuation of lands with buildings, only, if the land is fully developed, i.e., it has been put to full use legally permissible and economically justifiable, and the income out of the property is the normal commercial and not a controlled return, or a return depreciated on account of special circumstances. If the property is not fully developed, or the return is not commercial the method may yield a misleading result.

The expression "property" in Article 31 (2) as in Entry 42 of List III is wide enough to include an undertaking, and an undertaking subject to obligations may be compulsorily acquired under a law made in exercise of power under Entry 42, List III. The language of the amended clause (2) of Article 31 compared with the language of the clause before it was amended by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act leaves no room for doubt. Before it was amended, the guarantee covered the acquisition of "property movable or immovable including, and interest in, or in any company owning any commercial or industrial undertaking". In the amended clause only the word "property" is used, deleting the expressions which did not add to its connotation. But when an undertaking is acquired as a unit the principles for determination of compensation must be relevant and also appropriate to the acquisition of the entire undertaking. In determining the appropriate rate of the net profits the return from gilt-edged securities may, unless it is otherwise found unsuitable, be adopted.

Compensation to be determined under the Act is for acquisition of the undertaking, but the Act instead of providing for valuing the entire undertaking as a unit provides for determining the value of some only of the components, which constitute the undertaking, and reduced by the liabilities. It also provides different methods of determining compensation in respect of each such component. This method for determination of compensation is prima facie not a method relevant to the determination of compensation for acquisition of the undertaking. Aggregate of the value of components is not necessarily the value of the entirety of a unit of property acquired, especially when the property is a going concern, with an organized business. On that ground alone, acquisition of the undertaking is liable to be declared invalid, for it impairs the constitutional guarantee for payment of compensation for acquisition of property by law. Even if it be assumed that the aggregate value of the different components will be equal to the value of the undertaking of the named bank as a going concern the principles specified, in our judgment, do not give a true recompense to the banks for the loss of the undertaking. Schedule II by clause (1) provides :

"The compensation * * * in respect of the acquisition of the undertaking thereof shall be an amount equal to the sum total of the value of the assets of the existing bank as on the commencement of this Act, calculated in accordance with the provisions of Part I, less the sum total of the liabilities computed and obligations of the existing bank calculated in accordance with the provisions of Part II."

For the purpose of Part I "assets" means the total of the heads (a) to (h) and the expression "liabilities" is defined as meaning the total amount of all outside liabilities existing at the commencement of the Act and contingent liabilities which the corresponding new bank may reasonably be expected to be required to meet out of its own resources. Compensation payable to the named banks is accordingly the aggregate of some of the components of the undertaking, reduced by the aggregate of liabilities determined in the manner provided in the Schedule. It appears clear that in determining the compensation for undertaking—(i) certain important classes of assets are omitted from the heads (a) to (h), (ii) the method specified for valuation of lands and buildings is not relevant to determination of compensation, and the value determined thereby in certain circumstances is illusory as compensation; and (iii) the principle for determination of the aggregate value of liabilities is also irrelevant.

The undertaking of a banking company taken over as a going concern would ordinarily include the goodwill and the value of the unexpired period of long-term leases in the prevailing conditions in urban areas. But goodwill of the banks is not one of the items in the assets in the Schedule, and in cl. (f) though provision is made for including a part of the premium paid in respect of leasehold properties proportionate to the unexpired period, no value of the leasehold interest for the unexpired period is given.

Goodwill of a business is an intangible asset: it is the whole advantage of the reputation and connections formed with the customers together with the circumstances making the connection durable. It is that component of the total value of the undertaking which is attributable to the ability of the concern to earn profits over a course of years or in excess of normal amounts because of its reputation, location and other features : *Trego v. Hunt*¹. Goodwill of an undertaking therefore is the value of the attraction to customers arising for the name, and reputation for skill, integrity, efficient business management, or efficient service.

Business of banking thrives on its reputation for probity of its dealings, efficiency of the service it provides, courtesy and promptness of the staff, and above all the confidence it inspires among the customers for the safety of the funds entrusted. The Reserve Bank, it is true, exercises stringent control over the transactions which banks carry on in India. Existence of these powers and exercise thereof may and do ensure to a certain extent the safety of the funds entrusted to the Banks. But the business which a bank attracts still depends upon the confidence which the depositor reposes in the management. A bank is not like a grocer's shop : a customer does not extend his patronage to a bank merely because it has a branch easily accessible to him. Outside the public sector, there are 50 Indian scheduled banks, 13 foreign banks, beside 16 non-scheduled banks. The deposits in the banks not taken over under the Act range between Rs. 400 crores and a few lakhs of rupees. Deposits attracted by the major private commercial banks are attributable largely to the personal goodwill of the management. The regulatory provisions of the Banking Companies Act and the control which the Reserve Bank exercises over the banks may to a certain extent reduce the chance of the resources of the banks being misused, but a banking company for its business still largely depends upon the reputation of its management. We are unable to agree with the contention raised in the Union's affidavit that a banking establishment has no goodwill, nor are we able to accept the plea raised by the Attorney-General that the value of the goodwill of a bank is insignificant and it may be ignored in valuing the undertaking as a going concern.

Under clause (j) of Schedule II provision is made for valuing a proportionate part of the premium paid in respect of all leasehold properties to the unexpired duration of the leases, but there is no provision made for payment of compensation for the unexpired period of the leases. Having regard to the present day conditions it is clear that with rent control on leases operating in various States the unexpired period of leases has also a substantial value.

The value determined by excluding important components of the undertaking, such as the goodwill and value of the unexpired period of leases, will not in our judgment, be compensation for the undertaking.

The other defects in the method of valuation, it was claimed by Mr. Palkhivala, are the inclusion of certain assets such as cash, choses in action and similar assets which under the law are not regarded as capable of being acquired as property. This inclusion, it is contended, vitiates the scheme of acquisition. Under clause (a) of Part I—Assets—the amount of cash in hand and with the Reserve Bank and the State Bank of India (including foreign currency notes which shall be converted at the market rate of exchange) are liable to be included. Cash in hand is not an item which is capable of being compulsorily acquired, not because it is not property, but because taking over the cash and providing for acquisition thereof, compensation payable at some future date amounts to levying a "forced loan" in the guise of acquisition. This Court in *State of Bihar v. Maharajadhiraja Sir Kameshwar Singh of Darbanga and others*², held that cash and choses in action are not capable of compul-

Bihar School Examination Board v.
Subhas Chandra Sinha.
C.A. No. 2620 of 1969.

Bihar Schools Examinations Board Act, sections 6 (2) and 9 (3)—Cancellation of examination on the ground that unfair means were practised at the examination on a mass scale—Chairman of Bihar Schools Examinations Board if has powers—Examinees if entitled to hearing before cancellation—Principles of natural justice.

Under section 6 (2) of the Bihar Schools Examinations Board Act, the Board considers, moderates, determines and publishes the result of examinations. It also admits candidates to examinations, disqualifies them for any reason which it considers to be adequate. Under section 9 (3) of the Act in an emergency the power of the Chairman of the Board are co-terminus with those of the Board and he can take action himself and later report it to the Board. In this case action was taken by the Chairman and he reported it to the Board which fully endorsed it. Therefore, the cancellation of the examinations cannot be challenged on the ground that it was incompetently made.

It was not necessary for the Board to give an opportunity to the candidates if the examinations as a whole were being cancelled. The Board had not charged any one with unfair means so that he could claim to defend himself. The examination was vitiated by adoption of unfair means on a mass scale. In these circumstances it would be wrong to insist that the Board should hold a detailed inquiry into the matter and examine each individual case to satisfy itself which of the candidates had not adopted unfair means.

The essence of the examinations is that the worth of every person is appraised without any assistance from an outside source. If at a centre the whole body of students receive assistance and manage to secure success in the neighbourhood of 100 per cent when others at other centres are successful only at an average of 50 per cent, it is obvious that the university or the Board must do something in the matter. It cannot hold a detailed quasi-judicial inquiry with a right to its alumni to plead and lead evidence, etc. before the results are with-held or the examinations are cancelled. If there is sufficient material on which it can be demonstrated that the university was right in its conclusion that the examinations ought to be cancelled then academic standards require that the university's appreciation of the problem must be respected. It would not do for the Court to say that you should have examined all the candidates or even their representatives with a view to ascertaining whether they had received assistance or not. To do this would encourage indiscipline if not also perjury.

Mathura Prasad Bajoo Jaiswal v.
Dissibai N. B. Jeejeebhoy.
C.A. Nos. 1061 and 1627-1629 of 1966.

Civil Procedure Code (V of 1908), section 11—Decision on pure question of law or a question relating to jurisdiction of Court—If can operate as res judicata in subsequent proceedings.

A decision on an issue of law will operate as res judicata in a subsequent proceeding between the same parties. If the cause of action of the subsequent proceeding be the same as in the previous proceeding, but not when the cause of action is different, nor when the law has since the earlier decision been altered by a competent authority, nor when the decision relates to the jurisdiction of the Court to try the earlier proceeding, nor when the earlier decision declared valid a transaction which is prohibited by law.

A question relating to the jurisdiction of a Court cannot be deemed to have been finally determined by an erroneous decision of the Court. If by an erroneous interpretation of the statute the Court holds that it has no jurisdiction, the question would not, in operate as res judicata. Similarly by an erroneous decision if the Court assumes jurisdiction which it does not possess under the statute, the question cannot operate as res judicata between the same parties, whether the cause of action in the subsequent litigation is the same or otherwise.

Thus, where the decision is on a question of law, i.e., the interpretation of a statute, it will be res judicata in a subsequent proceeding between the same parties where the cause of action is the same, for the expression "the matter in issue" in section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, means the right litigated between the parties, i.e., the facts on which the right is claimed or denied and the law applicable to the determination of that issue. Where, however, the question is one purely of law, and relates to the jurisdiction of the Court or a decision of the Court sanctioning something which is illegal, by resort to the rule of res judicata a party affected by the decision will not be precluded from challenging the validity of that order under the rule of res judicata, for a rule of procedure cannot supersede the law of the land.

Conflict in case law discussed.

Century Spinning & Manufacturing Company Ltd. v.
The Ulhasnagar Municipal Council.
C.A. Nos. 2130 and 2131 of 1969.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 226—Exercise of extraordinary jurisdiction under—When may properly be declined.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), section 115—Estoppel—Public body like a municipality making a representation that something will be done in future—Such representation acted upon by another—Public body if can be compelled to perform its obligation.

The High Court may, in exercise of its discretion, decline to exercise its extraordinary jurisdiction under Article 226 of the Constitution. But the discretion is judicial: if the petition makes a claim which is frivolous, vexatious, or prima facie unjust, or may not appropriately be tried in a petition invoking extraordinary jurisdiction, the Court may decline to entertain the petition. But a party claiming to be aggrieved by the action of a public body or authority on the plea that the action is unlawful, high-handed, arbitrary or unjust is entitled to a hearing of its petition on the merits.

Merely because a question of fact is raised, the High Court will not be justified in requiring the party to seek relief by the somewhat lengthy, dilatory and expensive process of a civil suit against a public body, when the question of fact raised by the petition are elementary.

There is undoubtedly a clear distinction between a representation of an existing fact and a representation that something will be done in the future. The former may, if it amounts to a representation as to some fact alleged at the time to be actually in existence, raise an estoppel, if another person alters his position relying upon that representation. A representation that a something will be done in the future may result in a contract if another person to whom it is addressed acts upon it. A representation that something will be done in future is not a representation that it is true when made. But between a representation of a fact which is untrue and a representation, express or implied, to do something in future, there is no clear antithesis. A representation that something will be done in future may involve an existing intention to act in future in the manner represented. If the representation is acted upon by another person, it may, unless the statute governing the person making the representation provides otherwise, result in an agreement enforceable at law; if the statute requires that the agreement shall be in a certain form, no contract may result from the representation and acting thereon, but the law is not powerless to raise in appropriate cases an equity against him to compel performance of the obligation arising out of his representation.

Public bodies are as much bound as private individuals to carry out representations of facts and promises made by them, relying on which other persons have altered their position to their prejudice.

If our nascent democracy is to thrive, different standards of conduct for the people and the public bodies cannot ordinarily be permitted. A public body is, not exempt from liability to carry out its obligations arising out of representations made by it relying upon which a citizen has altered his position to his prejudice.

The Nagar Rice and Flour Mills v.
N. Teekappa Gowda & Bros.
C.A. No. 2228 of 1969.

Rice Milling Industry (Regulation) Act (XXI of 1958), sections 5 (4) and 8 (3) (c) — Contravention of section 8 (3) (c) — Effect — Issue of sanction for change of location of an existing rice mill — Sanctioning authority if bound to take into account matters specified under section 5 (4).

Section 8 (3) (c) is merely regulatory, if it is not complied with, the appellants (owners of the offending rice mill) may probably be exposed to a penalty, but a competitor in the business cannot seek to prevent the appellants from exercising their right to carry on business because of the default, nor can the rice mill of the appellants be regarded as a new rice mill. Competition in the trade or business may be subject to such restrictions as are permissible and are imposed by the State by a law enacted in the interests of the general public under Article 19 (6) of the Constitution, but a person cannot claim independently of such restriction that another person shall not carry on business or trade so as to affect his trade or business adversely.

The considerations which are prescribed by sub-section (4) of section 5 only apply to the grant of a permit in respect of a new rice mill or a defunct rice mill. They have no application in considering the shifting of the location of an existing rice mill. In respect of a new or defunct rice mill a permit and licence are both required; in respect of an existing rice mill only a licence is required. The conditions prescribed by sub-section (4) of section 5 only apply to the grant of a permit and not to a licence. By section 8 (3) (c) it is made one of the conditions of the licence that the location of the rice mill shall not be shifted without the previous permission of the Central Government. It is true that the appropriate authority clothed with the power must consider the expediency of permitting a change of location. But there is no statutory obligation imposed upon him to take into consideration the matters prescribed by sub-section (4) of section 5 in granting the permission to change the location.

C.A. Nos. 1188 and 1189 of 1968.

Motor Vehicles Act (IV of 1939), section 62—Application under—Proper form.

A temporary permit can be granted only if the permit is required for the purposes or reasons mention in clauses (a) to (d) of section 62. Where, therefore, an application for the grant of a temporary permit does not specify any reason or purpose for which it is asked for, it has to be dismissed in limini by the Regional Transport Authority.

sory acquisition. That view was repeated by this Court in *Bombay Dyeing and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. State of Bombay*¹, and *Ranajirao Shinde's case*². We do not propose to express our opinion on the question whether in adopting the method of determination of compensation, by aggregating the value of assets which constitute the under taking, the rule that cash and choses in action are incapable of compulsory acquisition may be applied.

Under item (e) the value of any land or buildings is one of the assets. The first Explanation provides that for the purpose of this clause (e) "value" shall be deemed to be the market value of the land or buildings, but where such market value exceeds the "ascertained value" determined in the manner specified in Explanation 2, the value shall be deemed to mean such "ascertained value." The value of the land and buildings is therefore the market value or the "ascertained value" whichever is less. Under Explanation 2, clause (1) "ascertained value" in respect of buildings which are wholly occupied on the date of the commencement of the Act is twelve times the amount of the annual rent or the rent for which the building may reasonably be expected to be let from year to year reduced by certain specified items. This provision, in our judgment, does not lay down a relevant principle of valuation of buildings. In the first place, making a provision for payment of capitalised annual rental at twelve times the amount of rent cannot reasonably be regarded as payment of compensation having regard to the conditions prevailing in the money market. Capitalization of annual rental which is generally based on controlled rent under some State Acts at rates pegged down to the rates prevailing in 1940 and on the footing that investment in buildings yields $8\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. return furnishes a wholly misleading result which cannot be called compensation. Value of immovable property has spiralled during the last few years and the rental which is mostly controlled does not bear any reasonable relation to the economic return from property. If the building is partly occupied by the Bank itself and partly by a tenant, the ascertained value will be twelve times the annual rental received, and the rent for which the remaining part occupied by the Bank may reasonably be expected to be let out. By the Act the corresponding new banks take over vacant possession of the lands and buildings belonging to the named banks. There is in the present conditions considerable value attached to vacant business premises in urban areas. True compensation for vacant premises can be ascertained by finding out the market value of comparable premises at or about the time of the vesting of the undertaking and not by capitalising the rental—actual or estimated. Vacant premises have a considerably larger value than business premises which are occupied by tenants. The Act instead of taking into account the value of the premises as vacant premises adopted a method which cannot be regarded as relevant. Prima facie, this would not give any reliable basis for determining the compensation for the land and buildings.

Again in determining the compensation under clause (e), the annual rent is reduced by several outgoings and the balance is capitalized. The first item of deduction is one-sixth of the amount thereof on account of maintenance and repairs. Whether the building is old or new, whether it requires or does not require maintenance or repairs $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. of the total amount of rent is liable to be deducted towards maintenance and repairs. The vice of items (v) and (vi) of clause (1) of Explanation 2 is that they provide for deduction of a capital charge out of the annual rental which according to no rational system of valuing property by capitalization of the rental method is admissible. Under item (v) where the building is subject to a mortgage or other capital charge, the amount of interest on such mortgage or charge, and under item (vi) where the building has been acquired, constructed, repaired, renewed or re-constructed with borrowed capital, the amount of any interest payable on such capital, are liable to be deducted from the annual rental for determining the ascertained value. These encumbrances are also liable to be deducted under the head "liabilities". A simple illustration may suffice to pinpoint the inequity of the method. In respect of a building owned by a bank of the value of Rs. 10 lakhs and mortgaged for say Rs. 7,50,000 interest at the rate of 8 per cent. (which may be regarded as the current commercial rate) would amount to Rs. 60,000. The estimated annual rental which would ordinarily not exceed Rs. 60,000 has under clause (e) to be reduced in the first instance by other outgoing. The assets would show a minus figure as value of the building, and on the liabilities side the entire amount of mortgage liability would be debited. The method provided by the Act permits the annual interest on the amount of the encumbrance to be deducted before capitalization, and the capitalized value is again reduced by the amount of the encumbrance. In effect, a single debt is, in determining the compensation debited twice, first, in computing the value of assets, and again, in computing the liabilities.

We are unable to accept the argument raised by the Attorney-General that under the head "liabilities" in Part II only those mortgages or capital charges in respect of which the amount has fallen due are liable to be included on the liabilities side. Under the head "liabilities" the total amount of all outside liabilities existing at the commencement of the Act, and all contingent liabilities which the corresponding new bank may reasonably be expected to be required to meet out of its own resources on or after the date of commencement of the Act will have to be included. When even contingent liabilities are included in the total amount of all outside liabilities, a mortgage debt or capital charge must be taken into account in determining the liabilities by which the aggregate of the value of assets is to be reduced, even if the period of the mortgage or capital charge has not expired. The liability under a mortgage or capital charge exists whether the period stipulated under the deed creating the encumbrance has expired or not.

Under clause (2) of Explanation 2, it is provided that buildings which are partly occupied the valuation shall be made on the basis of the "plinth area" occupied and multiplying it by the proportion which that area bears to the total plinth area of the buildings. The use of the expression "plinth area" appears to be unfortunate. What was intended is "floor area". If the expression "plinth area" is understood to mean "floor area", no fault may be found with the principle underlying clause (2) of Explanation 2.

Under clause (3) of Explanation 2, where there is open land which has no building erected thereon, or which is not appurtenant to any building, the value is to be determined "with reference to the prices at which sales or purchases of similar or comparable lands have been made during the period of three years immediately preceding the date of the commencement of" the Act. Whereas the value of the open land is to be the market value, the value of the land with buildings to be taken into account is the value determined by the method of capitalization of annual rent or market value whichever is less. The Explanation does not take into account whether the construction on the land fully develops the land, and the rental is economic.

We are, therefore, unable to hold that item (e) specifies a relevant principle for determination of compensation for lands and buildings. It is not disputed that the major Banks occupy their own buildings in important towns, and investments in buildings constitute a part of the assets of the Banks which cannot be treated as negligible. By providing a method of valuation of buildings which is not relevant the amount determined cannot be regarded as compensation.

We have already referred to item (f) under which a proportionate part of the premium paid is liable to be included in the assets but not the value for the unexpired period of the leases. Item (h) provides for the inclusion of the market or realizable value, as may be appropriate, of other assets appearing on the books of the bank, no value being allowed for capitalized expenses, such as share-selling commission, organizational expenses and brokerage, losses incurred and similar other items.

Mr. Palkhivala urged that certain assets which do not appear in the books of account still have substantial value, and they are omitted from consideration in computing the aggregate of the value of assets. Counsel said that every bank is permitted to have secret reserve and those secret reserves may not appear in the books of account of the banks. We are unable to accept that contention. A banking company is entitled to withhold from the balance-sheet its secret reserve, but there must be some account in respect of these secret reserves. The expression "books of the Bank" may not be equated with the balance sheets or the books of account only.

The expression "liabilities" existing at the commencement of "the Act includes all debts due or to become due. Under the head "liabilities" contingent liabilities which the corresponding new bank may reasonably be expected to be required to meet out of its own resources on or after the date of commencement of the Act are to be debited. The clause is badly drafted. The present value of the contingent liabilities at the date of the acquisition and not the total contingent liabilities may on any rational system of accounting be debited against the aggregate value of the assets. For instance, if a banking company is liable to pay to its employees gratuity, the present value of the liability to pay gratuity at the date of the acquisition made on actuarial calculation may alone be debited, and not the total face value of the liability.

The Attorney-General contended that even if the goodwill of a banking company is of substantial value, and inclusion of the goodwill is not provided for, or the value of buildings and lands is not the market value, or that there is a departure from recognized principles for determination of compensation, the deficiencies in the Act result merely in inadequate compensation within the meaning of Article 31 (2) of the Constitution and the Act cannot on that account be challenged as invalid. We are unable to agree with that contention. The constitution guarantees a right to compensation an equivalent in money of the property compulsorily acquired. That is the basic guarantee. The law must therefore provide compensation, and for determining compensation relevant principles must be specified, if the principles are not relevant the ultimate value determined is not compensation.

The Attorney-General also contended that if in consequence of the adoption of the method of valuation, an amount determined as compensation is not illusory, the Courts have no jurisdiction to question the validity of the law, unless the law is expropriatory, for, in the ultimate analysis the grievance relates to the adequacy of compensation. He contended that the exclusion of one of the elements in fixing the compensation, or application of a principle which is not a recognized principle, results in inadequate price, and is not open to challenge, and relied in support upon the observations made in *P. Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, which we have already quoted in another context in relation to the challenge to the validity of the Land Acquisition (Madras Amendment) Act, 1961, which excluded in determining compensation the potential value of the land. The Court held that exclusion of potential value amounted to giving inadequate compensation and was not a fraud on power. The principle of that case has no application when valuation of an undertaking is sought to be made by breaking it up into several heads of assets, and important heads are excluded and others valued by the application of irrelevant principles, or principles of which the only claim for acceptance is their novelty. The Constitution guarantees that the expropriated owner must be given the value of his property, i.e., what may be regarded reasonably as compensation for loss of the property and that such compensation should not be illusory and not reached by the application of irrelevant principles. In our view, determination of compensation to be paid for the acquisition of an undertaking as a unit after awarding compensation for some items which go to make up the undertaking and omitting important items amounts to adopting an irrelevant principle in the determination of the value of the undertaking, and does not furnish compensation to the expropriated owner.

1. (1964) 2 An.W.R. (S.C.) 173; (1954) 2 I S.C.R. 614 at 631.
M.L.J. (S.C.) 173; (1964) 2 S.C.J. 703.1965

The Attorney-General contended that the total value of the undertaking of the named banks even calculated according to the method provided in Schedule II exceeded the total market value of the shares, and on that account there is no ground for holding that the law providing for compensation denies to the shareholders the guarantee of the right to compensation under Article 31 (2). But there is no evidence on this part of the case.

Compensation may be provided under a statute, otherwise than in the form of money : it may be given as equivalent of money, e.g., a bond. But in judging whether the law provides for compensation, the money value at the date of expropriation of what is given as compensation, must be considered. If the rate of interest compared with the ruling commercial rate is low, it will reduce the present value of the bond. The Constitution guarantees a right to compensation—an equivalent of the property expropriated and the right to compensation cannot be converted into a loan on terms which do not fairly compare with the prevailing commercial terms. If the statute in providing for compensation devises a scheme for payment of compensation by giving it in the form of bonds, and the present value of what is determined to be given is thereby substantially reduced, the statute impairs the guarantee of compensation.

A scheme for payment of compensation may take many forms. If the present value of what is given reasonably approximates to what is determined as compensation according to the principles provided by the statute, no fault may be found. But if the law seeks to convert the compensation determined into a forced loan, or to give compensation in the form of a bond of which the market value at the date of expropriation does not approximate the amount determined as compensation, the Court must consider whether what is given is in truth compensation which is inadequate, or that it is not compensation at all. Since we are of the view that the scheme in Schedule II of the Act suffers from the vice that it does not award compensation according to any recognized principles, we need not dilate upon this matter further. We need only observe that by giving to the expropriated owner compensation in bonds of the face-value of the amount determined maturing after many years and carrying a certain rate of interest, the constitutional guarantee is not necessarily complied with. If the market value of the bonds is not approximately equal to the face-value, the expropriated owner may raise a grievance that the guarantee under Article 31 (2) is impaired.

We are of the view that by the method adopted for valuation of the undertaking, important items of assets have been excluded, and principles some of which are irrelevant and some not recognised are adopted. What is determined by the adoption of the method adopted in Schedule II does not award to the named banks compensation for loss of their undertaking. The ultimate result substantially impairs the guarantee of compensation, and on that account the Act is liable to be struck down.

IV. Infringement of the guarantee of freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse under Article 301—

In the view we have taken the provisions relating to determination and payment of compensation for compulsory acquisition of the undertaking of the named banks impair the guarantee under Article 31 (2) of the Constitution, we do not deem it necessary to decide whether Act XXII of 1969 violates the guarantee of freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse in respect of the (1) agency business; (2) business of guarantee and indemnity carried on by the named banks.

V. Validity of the retrospective operation given to Act XXII of 1969 by section 1 (2) and section 27—

The argument raised by Mr. Palkhivala that, even if the Act is within the competence of the Parliament and does not impair the fundamental rights under Articles 14, 19 (1) (f) and (g) and 31 (2) in their prospective operation, section 1 (2) and section 27 (2), (3) and (4) which give retrospective operation as from 19th July, 1969, are invalid, need not also be considered.

Nor does the argument about the validity of sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 11 and section 26 of the Act survive for consideration.

Accordingly we hold that—

(a) the Act is within the legislative competence of the Parliament ; but

(b) it makes hostile discrimination against the named banks in that it prohibits the named banks from carrying on banking business, whereas other Banks—Indian and Foreign—are permitted to carry on banking business, and even new Banks may be formed which may engage in banking business ;

(c) it in reality restricts the named banks from carrying on business other than banking as defined in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 ; and

(d) that the Act violates the guarantee of compensation under Article 31 (2) in that it provides for giving certain amounts determined according to principles which are not relevant in the determination of compensation of the undertaking of the named banks and by the method prescribed the amounts so declared cannot be regarded as compensation.

Section 4 of the Act is a kingpin in the mechanism of the Act. Sections 4, 5 and 6 read with Schedule II provide for the statutory transfer and vesting of the undertaking of the named banks in the corresponding new banks and prescribe the method of determining compensation for expropriation of the undertaking. Those provisions are, in our judgment, void as they impair the fundamental guarantee under Article 31 (2). Sections 4, 5 and 6 and Schedule II are not severable from the rest of the Act. The Act must, in its entirety, be declared void.

Petitions Nos. 300 and 298 of 1969 are therefore allowed, and it is declared that the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act XXII of 1969 is invalid and the action taken on deemed to be taken in exercise of the powers under the Act is declared unauthorised. Petition No. 222 of 1969 is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs in these three petitions.

Ray, J.—There are 89 commercial banks operating in India. Of these 89 banks 73 are Scheduled and 16 are non-Scheduled banks. The 73 Scheduled banks comprise State Banks with 7 subsidiaries aggregating 8, 15 foreign banks, 14 banks which are the subject-matter of the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Ordinance (VIII of 1969) (hereinafter referred to for the sake of brevity as the 1969 Ordinance) and the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act (XXII of 1969) (hereinafter referred to for the sake of brevity as the 1969 Act) and 36 banks which are outside the scope of the 1969 Act. The State Banks have 27 per cent. of the aggregate deposit of all commercial banks and 32 per cent. of the credit of all commercial banks. The State Bank and its 7 subsidiaries have Rs. 1,239 crores including current account in the total deposit and the total credit of the State Bank and its subsidiaries in Rs. 1,186 crores. The 14 Scheduled Banks each of which has over Rs. 500 crores of deposit which are the subject-matter of the 1969 Ordinance and the 1969 Act (hereinafter referred to for the sake of brevity as the 14 banks) and have Rs. 2,632 crores of deposit and the credit amounts to Rs. 1,829 crores. In other words, these 14 banks have 56 per cent of the total deposit and little over 50 per cent. of the total credit of the commercial banks. The 36 scheduled banks which are outside the 1969 Ordinance and the 1969 Act have Rs. 296 crores of deposit, viz., 6.3 per cent. of the aggregate deposit and the credit in Rs. 197 crores, or in other words, 4.5 per cent. of the total credit of the commercial banks. The 15 foreign banks have 10 per cent. of the credit and 10 per cent. of the deposit. These foreign banks have Rs. 478 cores of deposit and the credit is Rs. 385 crores. The 16 non-scheduled banks have Rs. 28 crores of deposit and the credit is about Rs. 16 crores. The non-scheduled banks have less than 1 per cent. of the total credit and of the deposit. The aggregate deposits of the State Bank of India and its 7 subsidiaries and of the 14 banks is 82.8 per cent. (26.5 per cent. + 56.3 per cent.) of the total deposits of 89 commercial banks and the aggregate credit of the said banks is 83.4 per cent. (32.8 per cent. + 50.6 per cent.) of the total credit of the 89 commercial banks.

Of the 89 commercial banks the State Banks have 2,454 branches, namely, 30 per cent. of the branch offices. The 15 foreign banks have 138 branch offices including branches. The 36 scheduled banks which are outside the 1969 Ordinance and the 1969 Act have 1,324 offices. The 16 non-scheduled banks have 216 offices. The 14 banks have 4,130 offices which represent about little over 50 per cent. of the offices. The aggregate of the number of offices of the State Bank and its 7 subsidiaries and the 14 banks is 6,584 being 79.8 per cent. of the total number of branch offices of the 89 commercial banks.

On 19th July, 1969 Ordinance VIII of 1969 called the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Ordinance, 1969 was promulgated by the Vice-President acting as President. It was an Ordinance to provide for the acquisition and transfer of the undertakings of certain banking companies in order to serve better the needs of development of the economy in conformity with national policy and objectives and for matters connected therewith or incidental thereto. The Ordinance came into force on 19th July, 1969. The Ordinance was repealed on 9th August, 1969, by the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act, 1969 which came into force on 9th August, 1969. The object of the Act was similar to that of the Ordinance. There are some differences between the Ordinance and the Act but it is not necessary for the purpose of the present matter to refer to the same.

Broadly stated, as a result of the 1969 Act the undertaking of every existing bank was transferred to and vested in the corresponding new bank on the commencement of the Act. The existing banks mean the 14 banks. The corresponding new banks mean the banks mentioned in the First Schedule to the 1969 Act in which is vested the undertakings of the existing banks. Section 5 of the 1969 Act deals with the effect of vesting. First, the undertaking shall be deemed to include all assets, rights, powers, authorities and privileges and all property, movable or immovable, cash balances, reserve funds, investments and all other rights and interests arising out of such property as were immediately before the commencement of the Act in the ownership, possession, power or control of the existing banks in relation to the undertaking, whether within or without India, and all books of accounts, registers, records and all other documents of whatever nature relating thereto. Secondly, the undertaking shall also be deemed to include all borrowings, liabilities (including contingent liabilities) and obligations of whatever kind then subsisting of the existing bank in relation to the undertaking. Thirdly, if according to the laws of any country outside India, the provisions of the 1969 Act by themselves are not effective to transfer or vest any asset or liability situated in that country which forms part of the undertaking of an existing bank to, or in, the corresponding new bank, the affairs of the existing bank in relation to such assets or liability shall, on and from the commencement of this Act, stand entrusted to the chief executive officer for the time being of the corresponding new bank who will take all steps as required by the laws of the Foreign Country for the purpose of affecting such transfer or vesting. Fourthly, all contracts, deeds, bonds, agreements, powers of attorney, grants of legal representation and other instruments of whatever nature, subsisting or having effect immediately before the commencement of the 1969 Act and to which the existing bank is a party and which are in favour of the existing bank shall be of as full force and effect against or in favour of the corresponding new bank and may be enforced or acted upon as fully and effectually as if in the place of the existing bank the corresponding new bank had been a party thereto or as if they had been issued in favour of the corresponding new bank. Fifthly, there are provisions that suits, appeals, or other proceedings pending by or against the existing bank be continued, prosecuted and enforced by or against the corresponding new bank.

Section 6 of the 1969 Act provides for payment of compensation and the second Schedule to the Act sets out the principles of determination of compensation by excluding liabilities from assets. Section 11 of the Act enacts that the corresponding new bank shall be guided by such directions in regard to matters of policy involving public interest as the Central Government may, after consultation with the Governor of the Reserve Bank, give, and if any question arises whether a direction relates to a matter of policy involving public interest, it shall be referred to the Central Government and the decision of the Central Government thereon shall be final. Section 12 provides for appointment of an Advisory Board to advise the custodian of the corresponding new bank. The custodian is the chief executive officer of the corresponding new bank. The Chairman of the existing bank holding office before the commencement of the Act becomes a custodian of the corresponding new bank. The custodian is to hold office during the pleasure of the Central Government. Section 13 of the Act provides power of the Central Government to make scheme. Section 15 is an important provision in the Act. Under that section a Chairman, managing or whole-time director of an existing bank shall, on the commencement of the Act, be deemed to have vacated office and every other director of such bank shall, until directors are duly elected by such existing bank, be deemed to continue to hold such office. The said Board may transact all or any of the various kinds of business mentioned in section 15. The other provision in section 15 is that the existing bank may carry on any business other than banking.

The Act of 1969 by reason of section 1 (2) thereof is deemed to have come into force on 19th July, 1969. Section 27 of the Act contains four sub-sections providing for the repeal of the Ordinance and enacting first, that notwithstanding the repeal of the Ordinance, anything done or any action taking including any order made, notification issued or direction given, under the said Ordinance shall be deemed to have been done, taken, made, issued or given, as the case may be, under the corresponding provisions of this Act; secondly, that no action or thing done under the said Ordinance shall, if it is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, be of any force or effect and thirdly notwithstanding anything contained in the Ordinance no right, privilege, obligation or liability shall be deemed to have been acquired, accrued or incurred thereunder.

The petitioner Rustom Cavasjee Cooper is a shareholder of the Central Bank of India Ltd., and of 3 other existing banks and has current and fixed deposit accounts with these banks and is also a director of the Central Bank of India. The petitioner has challenged the validity of the 1969 Ordinance and the 1969 Act and has contended that his fundamental rights under Articles 14, 19 and 31 have been infringed by these measures.

Mr. Palkhivala, counsel for the petitioner Contended that the Act of 1969 was effective only from 9th August, 1969 and could not have any effect on or from 19th July, 1969 until 9th August, 1969 because there could not be any retrospective effect given to any piece of legislation which affected the fundamental right to property. It was said that the validation would be effective as from the date when the law was actually passed and any retrospective effect would offend Article 31 (2) of the Constitution. It was said that acquisition under Article 31 (2) could only be by authority of law and authority of law could only mean a law in force at the date of the taking. It was emphasised that the law must be in existence at the material time and there was no difference between a law under Article 20 (1) and law in relation to Articles 31 (1) or Article 31 (2) of the Constitution.

The Attorney-General on the other hand contended that the validity of any law either prospective or retrospective affecting all or any of the fundamental rights under Article 19 has to be judged by the requirement laid down in Article 19 and the validity of a law either prospective or retrospective acquiring property has to be judged by the requirements laid down in Article 31 (2).

This Court dealt with retrospective legislations in the cases of *M/s. West Ramnad Electric Distribution Company Ltd. v. State of Madras*¹, and *State of Mysore v. Achiah Chetty*². In the case of *M/s. West Ramnad Electric Distribution Company Ltd.*¹, this Court held that there was difference between the provisions contained in Article 20 (1) and Article 31 (2) of the Constitution. Article 20 (1) refers to law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence whereas Article 31 (2) does not contain any such word of limitation as to law being in force at the time but speaks only of authority of a law. This vital distinction between Article 20 (1) and Article 31 (2) is to be kept in the forefront in appreciating the soundness of the proposition that retrospective legislation as to acquisition of property does not violate Article 31 (2).

In the case of *M/s. West Ramnad Electric Distribution Company*¹, the 1954 Madras Act incorporated the main provisions of the earlier Madras Act of 1949 in validating actions taken under the earlier 1949 Act. The 1949 Act had been challenged in earlier proceedings when this Court held the 1949 Act to be ultra vires. Section 24 of the 1954 Madras Act was intended to validate a notification of acquisition of undertaking issued on 21st September, 1951 under the 1949 Act by providing that orders made, decisions or directions given, notifications issued if they would have been validly made under the 1949 Act were declared to have been validly made except the extent to which the order was repugnant to the provisions of the later 1954 Act. In the Madras case it was contended that the notification under the 1949 Act in the year 1951 was not supported by any authority or any pre-existing law because there was no valid law. That contention was repelled by Gajendra-gadkar, J., who spoke for the Court "If the Act is retrospective in operation and section 24 has been enacted for the purpose of retrospectively validating actions taken under the provisions of the earlier Act, it must follow by the very retrospective operation of the relevant provisions that at the time when the impugned notification was issued, these provisions were in existence. That is the plain and obvious effect of the retrospective operation of the statute. Therefore in considering whether Article 31 (1) has been complied with or not, we must assume that before the notification was issued, the relevant provisions of the Act were in existence and so, Article 31 (1) must be held to have been complied with in that sense."

Article 20 (1) cannot by its own terms have any retrospective operation whereas Article 31 (2) can and that is a vital distinction between the two Articles. That is why there cannot be a retrospective legislation with regard to creation of an offence. If people at the time of the commission of an act did not know that it was an offence retrospective creation of a new offence in regard to such an act would put people to new peril which was not in existence at the time of the commission of the act. Counsel for the petitioner contended that retrospective validation of acquisition fell within the mischief of the decision of *Punjab Province v. Daulat Singh and others*³, where the Judicial Committee dealing with section 5 of the Punjab Alienation Act which provided for the avoidance of benami transactions as therein specified which were entered into either before or after the commencement of the Act of 1938 held that the same was ultra vires the Provincial Legislature because it would operate as a prohibition to affect the past transactions. The retrospective element however was severed in that case by the deletion of the words "either before or" in the section and the rest of the provisions were left to operate prospectively and validly. The ratio of the decision is that past transactions which had been closed and title which had been acquired were sought to be re-opened or set aside and the same could not be within the legislative competence of section 298 of the Government of India Act, 1935 which conferred power to prohibit the sale or mortgage of transactions. The words 'prohibit sale or mortgage' in section 298 of the Government of India Act, 1935 were construed to mean prospective or future prohibition as the words used plainly refer to things or transactions in future.

3. (1946) 73 I.A. 59 : (1946) 1 M.L.J. 426.

The decisions of this Court in *M/s. West Ramnad Electric Distribution Company*¹, and *State of Mysore v. Achiah Chetty*², are ample authorities for the proposition that there can be retrospective legislation affecting acquisition of property and such retrospective operation and validation of actions with regard to acquisition does not offend Article 31 (2) of the Constitution. In *State of Mysore and another v. D. Achiah Chetty, etc.*², Hidayatullah, C.J., considered the Bangalore Acquisition of Lands Act, 1962 which consisted of two sections whereof the second was in relation to validation of certain acquisition of lands and orders connected therewith. In short that section provided that all acquisitions, proceedings, notifications or orders were validly made, held or issued with the result that the Act validated all past actions notwithstanding any breach of City of Bangalore Improvement Act, 1945. Hidayatullah, C.J., said:

“What the legislation has done is to make retrospectively a single law for the acquisition of these properties. The Legislature could always have repealed retrospectively the Improvement Act rendering all acquisitions to be governed by the Mysore Land Acquisition Act alone. This power of the Legislature is not denied. The resulting position after the Validating Act is not different. By the non-obstante clause the Improvement Act is put out of the way and by the operative part the proceedings for acquisition are wholly brought under the Mysore Land Acquisition Act to be continued only under that Act. The Validating Act removes altogether from consideration any implication arising from Chapter III or section 52 of the Improvement Act in much the same way as if that Act had been passed.”

The correct legal position on the authority of these decisions of this Court is that a legislation which has retrospective effect affecting acquisition or requisition of property is not unconstitutional and is valid. The Act of 1969 which is retrospective in operation does not violate Article 31 (2) because it speaks of authority of a law without any words of limitation or restriction as to law being in force at the time.

Counsel for the petitioner next contended that the expression “authority of a law” in Article 31 (2) would have the same meaning as the expression “authority of law” in Article 31 (1) and therefore a law acquiring property would have to satisfy the tests required in Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. Both Articles 31 (2) and 19 (1) (f) relate to property. Both appear in Part III of the Constitution under fundamental rights. The Attorney-General contended that Article 31 (2) and 31 (2-A) constituted a self-contained code relating to acquisition and requisition of property, and once a property had been acquired by a law in compliance with the requirements of Article 31 (2) there would not be any right left under Article 19 (1) (f) and the validity of such a law of acquisition of property for public purpose could not be examined again by the requirements of Article 19 (5) which is a relaxation of Article 19 (1) (f).

The two requirements of a law relating to acquisition or requisition of property under Article 31 (2) are: first, that the acquisition or requisition of property can be made only for a public purpose, and secondly, it can only be by authority of a law which provides for compensation. Article 31 (2-A) further enacts that where a law does not provide for the transfer of the ownership or right to possession of any property to the State or to a corporation owned, controlled by the State, it shall not be deemed to provide for the compulsory acquisition or requisitioning of property.

The question for interpretation of Article 22 of the Constitution in the light of Article 19 came up for consideration in the case of *A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras*³. Kania, C.J., Patanjali Sastri, Mahajan, Mukherjea and Das, JJ. expressed the opinion that Article 19 of the Constitution had no application to a law which related directly to preventive detention even though as a result of an order of detention, the rights referred to in sub-clauses (a) to (e) and (g) in general and sub-clause (d) in particular, of clause (1) of Article 19 might be restricted or abridged. Fazl Ali, J. however expressed a contrary opinion. The consensus of opinion in *Gopalan's case*¹ was that so far as substantive law was concerned, Article 22 of the Constitution gave a clear authority to the Legislature to take away fundamental rights relating to arrest and detention which were secured by the first two clauses of that Article. Mukherjea, J., said about preventive detention in relation to right of freedom under Article 19

1. (1964) 1 S.C.J. 484.

2. (1969) 1 S.C.J. 709.

3. (1950) S.C.J. 174 : (1950) 2 M.L.J. 42 : (1950) S.C.R. 88.

"Any legislation on the subject would only have to conform to the requirements of clauses (4) to (7) and provided that is done, there is nothing in the language employed nor in the context in which it appears which affords any ground for suggestion that such law must be reasonable in its character and that it would be reviewable by the Court on that ground. Both Articles 19 and 22 occur in the same Part of the Constitution and both of them purport to lay down the fundamental rights which the Constitution guarantees. It is well settled that the Constitution must be interpreted in a broad and liberal manner giving effect to all its parts and the presumption would be that no conflict or repugnance was intended by its framers."

I shall now deal with some decisions of this Court as to whether a law acquiring property under Article 31 (2) will have to comply with Article 19 (1) (f) or in other words whether such law of acquisition of property for public purpose must also according to Article 19 (5) be a reasonable restriction on the right to hold property in the interests of the General public. There are decisions of this Court to the effect that acquisition of property under Article 31 (2) as it stood prior to amendment in 1955 is an instance of deprivation of property mentioned in Article 31 (1) and the two clauses of Article 31 are to be read together with the result that Article 19 (1) (f) has no application where a law amounts to acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose under Article 31 (2). When Article 31 (2) was amended by the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955, the decisions of this Court on that Article held that Article 19 (1) (f) applies only to a deprivation of property under Article 31 (1) but not to a law of acquisition of property for public purpose under Article 31 (2). I shall now refer to these decisions.

In the case of *State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal Bose*², the majority view of this Court was that clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 as these stood before the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955 are not mutually exclusive in scope and content but are to be read together and understood as dealing with the same subject, namely the protection of the right to property by means of limitations on the power of the State and the deprivation contemplated in clause (1) was held to be no other than the acquisition or taking possession of the property referred to in clause (2).

The view in *Gopalan's case*¹, was again applied by this Court in *State of Bombay v. Bhanji Munji and another*³,—also a pre-Amendment case—where it was contended that Article 31 (2) did not exclude the operation of Article 19 (1) (f) in relation to Bombay Land Acquisition Act, 1940. In dealing with the contention as to whether the Bombay Act was hit by Article 19 (1) (f) on the ground of unreasonable restriction having been imposed on the right of the respondent to acquire, hold and dispose of property Bose, J., said at page 780 of the Report:

"It is enough to say that Article 19 (1) (f) read with clause (5) postulates the existence of property which can be enjoyed and over which rights can be exercised because otherwise the reasonable restrictions contemplated by clause (5) could not be brought into play. If there is no property which can be acquired, held or disposed of, no restriction can be placed on the exercise of the right to acquire, hold or dispose of it, and as clause (5) contemplates the placing of reasonable restrictions on the exercise of those rights it must follow that the Article postulates the existence of property over which these rights can be exercised."

Bose, J., thereafter said that when every form of enjoyment of and interest in property is taken away leaving the mere husk of title Article 19 (1) (f) is not attracted.

The principle laid down in *Bhanji Munji's case*¹, was considered in the case of *Kavalappara Kottarathil Kochuni and others v. The State of Madras and others*². In that case a question arose whether the Madras Marumakkathayam (Removal of Doubts) Act, 1955 infringed the provisions of the Constitution. The Act was passed after the Privy Council had declared the properties in possession of the Sthanee to be Sthanam properties in which the members of the Tarwad had no interest. The Madras Act, 1955 declared that:

“notwithstanding any decision of Court, any sthanam under certain conditions mentioned in the section shall be deemed to be and shall be deemed always to have been a Marumakkathayam Tarwad and the properties appertaining to such a sthanam shall be deemed to be and shall be deemed always to have been properties belonging to the Tarwad.”

Subba Rao, J. speaking for the majority view on the question as to whether Article 31 (1) had to be read along with Article 19 (1) (f) said:

“that legislation in a welfare State could be achieved only within the framework of the Constitution and that is why reasonable restrictions in the interest of the general public on the fundamental rights were recognised in Article 19.”

In that context this Court held that a law made depriving a citizen of his property shall be void, unless the law so made complied with the provisions of clause (5) of Article 19 of the Constitution. At page 916 of the Report Subba Rao, J. said that the observations in *Gopalan's case*³, would have no bearing on Article 31 (1) of the Constitution after clause (2) of Article 31 had been amended and clause (2-A) had been inserted in that Article by the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955. Before the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act this Court held that clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 were not mutually exclusive in scope and content but were to be read together, namely, that the words “acquisition or taking possession” referred to in clause (2) of Article 31 prior to the Amendment in 1955 were to be read as an instance of deprivation of property within the meaning of Article 31 (1) and therefore the same was not subject to Article 19. This is how the decision in *Bhanji Munji's case*¹, was explained by Subba Rao, J. in *Kochuni's case*², with the observation that “the decision in *Bhanji Munji's case*¹, no longer holds the field after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955.” It may be stated here that *Kochuni's case*², was decided after the amendment of Article 31 and that was emphasised by Subba Rao, J. to establish that Article 31 (1) which dealt with deprivation of property other than by way of acquisition by the State was to be a valid law or in compliance with limitations imposed in Article 19 (1) (f) and (5).

The question whether Article 19 (1) (f) is to be read along with Article 31 (1) again raised its head in the case of *Smt. Sitabati Devi and another v. State of West Bengal and another*⁴. *Kochuni's case*¹, was decided on 4th May, 1960 and *Smt. Sitabati's case*⁴, was decided on 1st December, 1961 though it was reported much later in the Supreme Court Reports. In *Smt. Sitabati's case*⁴, the question for consideration was the validity of the West Bengal Land (Requisition and Acquisition) Act, 1948. The Act provided for requisition and also for acquisition of land by the State Government for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community and for other purposes mentioned therein. The Act also provided for payment of compensation in respect of requisition and acquisition. In *Smt. Sitabati's case*⁴, it was contended that the Act offended Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution as it put unreasonable restrictions on the right to hold property. The High Court held that the Act providing for acquisition of property by the State could not be attacked for the reason that it offended Article 19 (1) (f) on the authority of the decision in Bhanji Munji v.

2. (1960) 3 S.C.R. 887 : (1961) 2 S.C.J. 443.

3. (1950) S.C.J. 174; (1950) 2 M.L.J. 42.
4. (1967) 2 S.C.R. 949.

*State of Bombay*¹. The High Court further held that the decision in *Kochani's case*², did not hold that Article 31 (2) of the Constitution did not excluded the applicability of Article 19 (1) (f). Sarkar, J. speaking for the Court said that the High Court was right on both these points. Sarkar, J. pointed out that *Kochani's case*², dealt with Article 31 (1) and it was not a case of acquisition or requisition of property by the State but was concerned with the law by which deprivation of property was brought about in other ways and there Article 19 of the Constitution had to be complied with. In *Smt. Sitabati's case*³, it was said that the observation in *Kochani's case*², that *Bhanji Munji's case*⁴, "no longer holds the field" was to be understood as meaning that it no longer governed the case of deprivation of property by means other than requisition and acquisition by the State. To my mind it appears that the view of this Court in *Kochani's case*², and *Smt. Sitabati's case*³ is that Article 31 (2) after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955 relates entirely to acquisition or requisition of property by the State and is totally distinct from the scope and content of Article 31 (1) with the result that Article 19 (1) (f) will not enter the area of acquisition or requisition of property by the State.

This Court in the recent decision of *State of Gujarat v. Shankilal Mangaldas and others*⁴, again considered the applicability of Article 19 (1) (f) in relation to acquisition or requisition of property under the authority of a law mentioned in Article 31 (2). The Bombay Town Planning Act of 1955 was challenged as unreasonable and a violation of Article 19 (1) (f) and (5). Shah, J., speaking for the Court considered Article 31 (2) as it stood after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955 and said "clause (1) operates as a protection against deprivation of property save by authority of law which it is beyond question, must be a valid law, i.e., it must be within the legislative competence of the State Legislature and must not infringe any other fundamental right. Clause (2) guarantees that property shall not be acquired or requisitioned [except in cases provided by clause (5)] save by authority of law providing for compulsory acquisition or requisition and further providing for compensation for the property so acquired or requisitioned and either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which, and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined or given."

Thereafter Shah, J. speaking for the Court said in repelling the contention advanced that the impugned statute was unreasonable.

"This Court however held in *Smt. Sitabati Devi v. State of West Bengal*⁵, that a law made under clause (2) of Article 31 is not liable to be challenged on the ground that it imposes unreasonable restrictions upon the right to hold or dispose of property within the meaning of Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. In *Smt. Sitabati Devi's case*⁵, an owner of land whose property was requisitioned under the West Bengal Land (Requisition and Acquisition) Act, 1948 questioned the validity of the Act by a writ petition filed in the High Court of Calcutta on the plea that it offended Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. This Court unanimously held that the validity of the Act relating to acquisition and requisition cannot be questioned on the ground that it offended Article 19 (1) (f) and cannot be decided by the criterion under Article 19 (5)."

In my opinion Article 19 (1) (f) does not have any application to acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose under authority of a law which provides for compensation as mentioned in Article 31 (2) for these reasons. First, the provisions of the Constitution are to be interpreted in a harmonious manner. No provision of the Constitution is superfluous or redundant. [See *Gopalan's case*⁶ at page 252 per Mukherjea, J.]. It cannot be suggested that acquisition of property for public purpose is not of the same content as acquisition for public interest or in the interest of the public. It will be pedantry to say that acquisition for public purpose is not in the interest of the public. Secondly, the contention on behalf of the petitioner that Article 31 (2) will have to be read along with Article 19 (1) (f)

1. (1955) S.C.J. 10; (1955) 1 S.C.R. 777.

2. (1963) S.C.R. 887; (1961) 2 S.C.J. 443.

3. (1967) 2 S.C.R. 949.

4. A.I.R. 1969 S.C. 634; (1969) 2 S.C.J. 322.

5. (1950) 2 M.L.J. 42; (1953) S.C.J. 174.

for the purpose of deciding the place of legislation on the anvil of reasonableness of restrictions in the interest of the general public will mean that acquisition or requisition for a public purpose under Article 31 (2) is embraced within Article 19 (5). That would be not only depriving the provisions of the Constitution of harmony but also making Article 31 (2) otiose and a dead letter. By harmonising is meant that each provision is rendered free to operate, with full vigour in its own legitimate field. If acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose has to satisfy again the test of reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public then harmony is repelled and Article 31 (2) becomes a mere repetition and meaningless. It could not be said that when Article 31 (2) was specifically enacted to deal with a case of acquisition or requisition of property for a public purpose the framers of the Constitution were not aware that it was a form of public deprivation of property. That is why it is important to notice the distinction between deprivation of property under Article 31 (1) which will relate to all kinds of deprivation of property other than acquisition or requisition by the State and Article 31 (2) which deals only with such acquisition or requisition of property. Thirdly, Article 31 (2) and 31 (2-A) is a self contained code because (a) it provides for acquisition or requisition with authority of a law, (b) the acquisition or requisition is to be for a public purpose, (c) the law should provide for compensation by fixing the amount of compensation or specifying the principles on which, and the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined and given and (d) finally, it enacts that adequacy of compensation is not to be questioned. In the case of acquisition or requisition of property for public purpose with the authority of a law providing for compensation there is nothing more to guide and govern the law for acquisition or requisition than those crucial words occurring in clause (2). Finally, the amendment of Article 31 indicates in bold relief the separate and distinctive field of law for acquisition and requisition by the State of property for public purpose.

Mahajan, J. in the case of *State of Bihar v. Maharaja Darbhanga*¹, spoke of public purpose in the background of Article 39 which speaks of the Directive Principles. Article 39 enacts that the State shall in particular direct its policy towards securing that the ownership and control of the material resources of the community are so distributed as best to subserve common good and that the operation of the economic system does not result in the concentration of wealth and means of production to the common detriment. In the *Darbhanga case*¹, land which was in the hands of few individuals was to be made available to the public. The purpose behind the Bihar Land Reforms Act was to bring general benefit to the community. Mahajan, J., said that "Legislature is best judge of what is good for the community, by whose suffrage it comes into existence and it is not possible for this Court to say that there was no purpose behind the acquisition contemplated by the impugned statute. The purpose of the statute is in accordance with the letter of the Constitution of India. It is fallacious to contend that the object of the Act is to ruin 5½ million people in Bihar..... Its difficult to hold in the present day conditions of the world that the measures adopted for the welfare of the community and sought to be achieved by process of legislation so far as to carry on the policy of nationalization of land can fall on the ground of public purpose. The phrase 'public purpose' has to be construed according to the spirit of times in which particular legislation is enacted and so construed, the acquisition of the estates has to be held to have been made for the public purpose." The meaning of the phrase 'public purpose' is predominantly a purpose for the welfare of the general public. These 14 banks are acquired for the purpose of developing the national economy. It is intended to confer benefit on weaker sections and sectors. It is not that the legislation will have the effect of denuding the depositors in the 14 banks of their deposits. The deposits will all be there. The object of the Act according to the legislation is to use the deposits in wider public interest. What was true of public purpose when the Constitution was ushered in the mid century is a greater truth after two decades. One cannot be guided either by passion for property on the one hand or prejudice against deprivation on the other. Public purpose steers, clear of both passion and prejudice.

In regard to property rights the State generally has power to take away property and justify such deprivation on the ground of reasonable restriction on the interest of the general public, but in case of deprivation of property by acquisition or requisition the Constitution has conferred power when the law passed provides compensation for the property acquired by the State. Therefore, the acquisition or requisition for public purpose is a restriction recognised by the Constitution in regard to property rights. In *Kochuni's case*¹, this Court approved the observation of Harries, C.J. in the case of *Iswari Prasad v. A. R. Sen*², that the phrase "in the interest of the general public" means nothing more than "in the public interest." A public purpose is a purpose affecting the interest of the general public and therefore the Welfare State is given powers of acquisition or requisition of property for public purpose.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that the word 'banking' would have the same meaning as the definition of 'banking' occurring in section 5 (b) of the Banking Regulation Act of 1949 hereinafter referred to for the sake of brevity as the 1959 Act. This contention was amplified to exclude four types of business from the banking business and therefore the Act of 1969 was said to be not within the legislative competence of Banking under Entry 45 in List I. These four types of business are: (1) the receiving of scrips or other valuables on deposit or for safe custody and providing of safe deposit vaults, (2) agency business, (3) business of guarantee, giving of indemnity and underwriting and (4) business of acting as executors and trustees. 'Banking' was defined for the first time in the 1949 Act as meaning the acceptance for the purpose of lending or investments of deposits of money from the public repayable on demand or otherwise and withdrawable by cheque, draft or otherwise. In England there is no statutory definition of banking by the Courts have evolved a meaning and principle as to what the legitimate business of a bank is.

In the case of *Tennant v. The Union Bank of Canada*³, a question arose as to whether warehouse receipts taken in security by a bank in the course of business of banking are matters coming within the class of subjects described in section 91, sub-section 15 of the British North America Act, namely, 'banking, incorporation of Banks, and the issue of paper money.' Lord Watson said that the word 'banking' comprehends an expression which is wide enough to embrace every transaction coming within the legitimate business of a banker. In Palmer's Company Precedents, 17th edition page 317 form No. 98 will be found the usual memorandum of objects of a bank. These objects comprise business of banking in all branches including the receiving of money and valuables on deposit or for safe custody, or otherwise, the collecting and transmitting money and securities and transacting all kinds of agency business commonly transacted by bankers. The other objects in the form are to undertake and execute any trusts the undertaking whereof may seem desirable, and also to undertake the office of executor, administrator, receiver, treasurer, registrar or auditor. In *Banbury v. Bank of Montreal*⁴, the House of Lords considered the authority of the bank to give advice as to investments and Lord Finlay, L.C. said that "the limits of banker's business cannot be laid down as a matter of law. The nature of business is a question of fact, on which the jury are entitled to have regard to their own knowledge of business and it is in this context that the present case must be considered. It cannot be treated as if it was a matter of pure law."

In India, the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, Stamp Act, 1889 and Bankers Book Evidence Act, 1891 refer to the expression banking without a definition. In the Indian Companies Act, 1913 for the first time in 1936 provisions were introduced to govern banking companies. Entry 38 in List I of the Government of India Act,

1. (1961) 2 S.C.J. 443.
2. A.I.R. 1952 Cal. 273.

3. L.R. (1894) A.C. 31 : 35 L.J.P.C. 25.
4. L.R. (1918) A.C. 626 : 87 L.J.K.B. 1155.

1935 used the words "banking that is to say the conduct of banking business of a Corporation carried on only in that State." It must be observed that Entry 45. in List I of the 7th Schedule to the Constitution is only a 'banking' and it does not contain any qualifying words like the conduct of business occurring in Entry 38: of the Government of India Act, 1935. The Indian Companies Act, 1913 in section 277-F however defined 'banking company' but not 'banking' by reference to the principal business and other business usually undertaken by reputable bankers. Section 277-G of the Indian Companies Act prescribes that the memorandum must be limited to the activities mentioned in section 277-F. Section 277-M of the Indian Companies Act, 1913 contained provisions similar to section 19 of the Act of 1949, namely, that a banking company could not form any subsidiary company except a subsidiary company, formed for one or more of the following purposes, namely, the undertaking and executing of trusts, the undertaking of the administration of estates as executors trustees or otherwise, the providing of safe deposit vaults or, with the previous permission in writing of the Reserve Bank carrying on such other purposes as are incidental to the business of banking. It will appear from the Select Committee Report which was prepared for the introduction of the Indian Companies Amendment Act in 1936 that the list of business mentioned in section 277-F which included the principal business and other business undertaken by reputable bankers was inserted to escape the danger of hampering a company in the performance of any form of business undertaken by reputable bankers.

It is in this background that the 1949 Banking Regulation Act was enacted. 'Banking' is defined in section 5 (b) of the 1949 Act as meaning the acceptance for the purpose of lending or investment of deposits of money from the public repayable on demand or otherwise and withdrawable by cheque, draft order or otherwise. Section 6 of the 1949 Act contains two sub-sections. In sub-section (1) it is enacted that in addition to the business of banking, a banking company may engage in one or more of the forms of business mentioned therein. In sub-section (1) there are clauses marked (a) to (n). In sub-section (2) of section 6 of the 1949 Act it is enacted that no banking company shall engage in any business other than those referred to in sub-section (1). Clause (a) of section 6 (1) enumerates the various forms of business, inter alia, the borrowing, raising, or taking up of money, the lending or advancing of money either upon or without security, the drawing, making, accepting, discounting, buying, selling, collecting and dealing in bills of exchange, hundees, promissory notes, coupons, drafts, bills of lading, railway receipts, warrants, debentures, certificates, scrips and other instruments and securities whether transferable or negotiable or not, the granting and issuing of letters of credit, traveller's cheques and circular notes, the buying, selling and dealing in bullion and specie, the receiving of all kinds of bonds, scrips or valuables on deposit or for safe custody or otherwise, the providing of safe deposit vaults, the collecting and transmitting of money and securities. Clause (b) speaks of acting as agents for any Government or local authority or any other person or persons, the carrying on of agency business of any description including the clearing and forwarding of goods, giving of receipts and discharges and otherwise acting as an attorney on behalf of the customers, but excluding the business of a company. Clause (c) speaks of undertaking and executing trusts. Clause (i) speaks of undertaking the administration of estates as executor, trustee or otherwise. It will, therefore, appear that under section 61 (1) of the 1949 Act the four types of business disputed by Counsel for the petitioner not to be within the businesses of a bank are recognised by the statute as legitimate forms of business of a banking company.

Keeping valuables for safe custody, the providing of safe deposit vaults occur in clause (a) of section 6 (1) along with various types of business like borrowing, raising or taking up of money, or lending or advancing of money. It will appear from clause (n) of section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act that in addition to the forms of business mentioned in clauses (a) to (n) a banking company may engage in "doing all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the promotion or advancement of the business of the company." The words 'other things' appearing in clause (n) after enumeration of the various types of business in clauses (a) to (m) point to one inescapable conclusion that the businesses mentioned in clauses (a) to (m) are all incidental or conducive to the promotion or advancement of the business of the company. Therefore these businesses are not only legitimate businesses of the banks but these also come within the normal business activities of commercial banks of repute. Entry 45 in List I of the 7th Schedule of the Constitution, namely, 'banking' will therefore have the wide meaning to include all legitimate businesses of a banking company referred to in section 5 (b) as well as in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act. The contention on behalf of the petitioner that the four disputed businesses are not banking businesses is not supportable either on logic or on principle when businesses mentioned in the sub-clauses of section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act are recognised to be legitimate business activities of a banking company by statute and practice and usage fully supports that view.

Clause (o) of section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act contemplates that the Central Government might by notification specify any other form of business and therefore the Government could ask a banking company to engage in a form of business which is not a usual type of business done by a banking company. In the first place, it would not be reasonable to think that the Government would ask a bank to do business of that type. Secondly, even if a bank were asked to do so that would not rob the other permissible and legitimate forms of business mentioned in section 6 (1) of the Act of their true character. Section 6 (2) of the 1949 Act provides that no banking company shall engage in any form of business other than those referred to in sub-section (1). The restriction contained in sub-section (2) establishes that the various types of business mentioned in sub-section (1) are normal, recognised legitimate businesses and a banking company is therefore not entitled to participate in any other form of business.

In the case of *Commonwealth of Australia and others v. Bank of New South Wales and others*¹, the Judicial Committee in hearing the appeal from the High Court of Australia considered the meaning and content of banking. The question for consideration was the effect of the Australian Banking Act, 1947 and section 46 thereof. At page 303 of the Report the Judicial Committee said "the business of banking, consisting of the creation and transfer of credit, the making of loans, the purchase and disposal of investments and other kindred activities is a part of the trade commerce and intercourse of a modern society and, in so far as it is carried on by, means of inter-State transactions, is within the ambit of section 92". The business of a bank will therefore consist not only of the hard core of banking business defined in the 1949 Act but also of the diverse kinds of lawful business which have grown to be inextricably bound up in the form of chain or string transactions. The words 'banker', 'banking' have different shades of meaning at different periods of history and their meaning may not be uniform today in countries of different habits of life and different degrees of civilisation. See *Bank of Chettinad v. T.C. of Colombo*², and *United Dominions Trust Ltd. v. Kirkwood*³.

At this stage reference may be made to various statutes starting from Act VI of 1839 Bank of Bengal's Third Charter and ending with the State Bank of India Act, 1955 to show the meaning and content of the word 'banking'. The Bank of a Bengal's Third Charter of 1839 empowered the Bank of Bengal in clauses 25 to 33 to do business as mentioned therein which included receiving deposits of goods and safe-keeping of the same. Thereafter the Bank of Bengal Charter was repealed by Act IV of 1862 which by clause 27 empowered the bank to transact pecuniary business of agency on commission. The Presidency Banks Act, 1876 by section 36 thereof empowered the Presidency Banks, inter alia, to do business of receiving of deposits, agency business, acceptance of valuables, jewels. Section 37 of the Act of 1876 forbade the bank to do any business or loan or advance on mortgage or in other manner upon the security of any immovable property, or the documents of title relating thereto. The Imperial Bank of India Act, 1920 in Schedule I as mentioned in section 8 of the Act authorised the bank to carry on several kinds of business including receiving of deposits, keeping cash accounts, the acceptance of the charge and management of plate, jewels, title deeds or other valuable goods on terms, transacting of pecuniary agency business on commission and the entering into of contracts of indemnity, suretyship or guarantee with specific security or otherwise, the administration of estates for any purpose whether as an executor, trustee or otherwise, and the acting as agent on commission in the transaction of various kinds of business mentioned therein.

The Indian Companies Act, 1913 did not define banking company or banking business though various sections, namely, 4, 133, 136, 138 and 145 and Schedule Form G referred to banking companies. The Indian Companies Amendment Act in 1936 for the first time defined a banking company in section 277-F as a company which carried on the principal business of accepting of deposits on current account or otherwise, notwithstanding that it engaged in any one or more of the businesses as mentioned in clauses (1) to (17) thereof. It may be stated here that clauses (1) to (17) in section 277-F of the Indian Companies Act, 1913 are similar to the various forms of business mentioned in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Banking Regulation Act. In 1942, the Indian Companies Act, 1913 was amended by Act XXI of 1942 and it will appear from the statement of objects and reasons there that the definition of banking companies in section 277-F of the Indian Companies Act created difficulties in deciding whether a company was a banking company or not. The chief difficulty arose out of the use of the term 'principal business' in section 277-F. With the object of removing these difficulties a proposal was made that any company which used as part of its name the word 'bank,' 'banker' or 'banking' shall be deemed to be a banking company irrespective of whether the business of accepting deposits of money on current account or otherwise subject to withdrawal by cheque, draft or order was its principal business or not. In that context Ordinance IV of 1946 was promulgated under section 72 of the Government of India Act, 1935 empowering the Reserve Bank to cause inspection of any banking company and to do various other things by way of prohibiting a banking company from receiving deposits. Thereafter came the Banking Companies Restriction of Branches Act, 1946. There a banking company was defined as a banking company defined in section 277-F of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. There was restriction on opening and removal of branches and the Reserve Bank was permitted to cause inspection of banks. It is in this context that Ordinance XXV of 1948 was promulgated conferring power on the Reserve Bank to control advances given by the banking companies. In 1948 a confidential note on the Banking Companies Bill was prepared. The necessity of legislation was felt because there was insufficient paid up capital and reserve and insufficient liquidity of funds, unrestricted loans to directors. In that confidential note it was said that it was difficult to evolve any satisfactory definition of banking and difficulties arose because of the incorporation of the words 'principal business' in relation to banks in section 277-F of the Indian Companies Act, 1913.

In this background the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 was enacted. I have already referred to the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the 1949 Act and the businesses mentioned in section 6 (1) and the definition of banking business in section 5 (b). A most noticeable feature with regard to all these types of business of a banking company is that a banking company engages not only in the banking business but other businesses mentioned in section 6 of the 1949 Act with depositors' money. The entire business is one integrated whole. The provisions contained in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act are the statutory restatement of the gradual evolution over a century of the various kinds of business of banking companies which are similar to those to be found in the State Bank of India Act, 1955 hereinafter called the State Bank Act. The business with regard to deposit of valuables and safe deposit vaults is to be found in section 3 (viii) of the State Bank Act, the agency business is mentioned in section 33 (xii) of the State Bank Act. The business of guarantee, underwriting and indemnity is found in section 33 (xi) (xii) (a) of the State Bank Act and the business of trusteeship and executorship is specifically found in the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 and in the previous Acts referred to hereinbefore.

It was suggested by Counsel for the petitioner that by banking business is meant only the hard core of banking, as defined in section 5 (b) of the 1949 Act. It is unthinkable that the business of banks is only confined to that aspect and not to the various forms of business mentioned in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act. Receiving valuables on deposit or for sale custody and providing for safe deposit vaults which are contemplated in clause (a) of section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act cannot be dissociated from other forms of unchallenged business of a bank mentioned in that clause because any such severance would be illogical particularly when deposit for safe custody and safe deposit vaults are mentioned in the long catalogue of businesses in clause (a). The agency business which is mentioned in clause (b) of section 6 (1) is one of the recognised forms of business of commencing banks with regard to mercantile transactions and payment or collection of price. Agency is after all a comprehensive word to describe the relationship of appointment of the bank as the constituents' representative. The forms of agency transactions may be varied. It may be acting as collecting agent or disbursing agent or as depository of parties. The categories of agency can be multiplied in terms of transactions. That is why the business of agency mentioned in clause (b) is first in the general form of acting as an agent for any Government or local authority, secondly carrying on of agency business of any description including the clearing and forwarding of goods and thirdly acting as attorney on behalf of the customers. The business of guarantee is in the modern commercial world practically indissolubly connected with a bank and forms a part of the business of the bank. It is almost common place for Courts to insist on bank guarantee in regard to furnishing of security. There may be so many instances of guarantee. As to the business of trusteeship and executorship it may be said that this is the wish of the seller who happens to be a constituent of the bank appointing the bank as executor or trustee because of the utmost faith and confidence that the constituent has in the solvency and stability of the bank and also to preserve the continuity of the trustee or the executor irrespective of any change by reason of death or any other incapacity. It is needless to state that these four disputed forms of business all spring out of the relation between the bank on the one hand and the customer on the other and the bank earns commission on these transactions or charges fees for the services rendered. Although trust accounts may be kept in a separate account all moneys arising out of the trust money go to the general pool of the bank and the bank utilises the money and very often trust moneys may be kept in fixed deposit with the trustee bank and expenses on account of the trust are met out of the general funds of the trustee bank. Payments to beneficiaries are made by crediting the beneficiaries' accounts in the trustee bank and if they are not constituents other modes of payment through other banks are adopted. The position of the banks as executor is similar to that of a trustee. Whatever moneys the bank may spend are recouped by the bank out of the accounts of the trust estate.

After the definition of banking company had been introduced for the first time in 1936 in the Indian Companies Act, 1913 it appeared that the banks were not being managed properly and the definition of a banking company gave rise to administrative difficulties in determining whether a company was a banking company or not. A number of banking and loan companies particularly in Bengal claimed that they were not banking companies within the scope of the definition given in section 277-F of the Companies Act and in some cases their contention was upheld by the Court. The failure of the Travancore National & Quilon Bank Ltd., in 1938 and the subsequent banking crisis in South India posed a big question as to the desirability of better legislation. An attempt was made to prescribe certain minimum capital, the amount of capital depending upon the area of the operation of the bank. The banks were also asked to maintain a percentage of their assets in cash or approved securities. Thereafter the Indian Companies (Amendment) Act was passed in 1942 by which a proviso was added to section 277-F to the effect that any company which used as part of its name the word 'bank', 'banker' or 'banking' shall be deemed to be a banking company notwithstanding the fact that the acceptance of deposits on current account subject to withdrawal by cheque is not the principal business of the company. In the mid-forties it became desirable that steps should be taken to safeguard the banking structure against possible repercussion in the post-war period and it was considered necessary that comprehensive banking legislation should be introduced.

There are various provisions in the 1949 Act to indicate that a banking company cannot carry on business of a managing agent or Secretary and treasurer of a company and that it cannot acquire, construct, maintain, alter any building or works other than those necessary or convenient for the purpose of the company. A banking company cannot acquire or undertake the whole or any portion of any business unless such business is of one of those enumerated in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act. A bank cannot deal in buying or selling or bartering of goods except in connection with certain purposes related to some of the businesses enumerated in the aforesaid section 6 (1). These provisions also establish that businesses mentioned in section 6 of the 1949 Act are incidental and conducive to banking business. A bank cannot employ any person whose remuneration is in the form of a commission or a share in the profits of the banking company or whose remuneration is in the opinion of the Reserve Bank excessive. One of the most important provisions is section 35 of the 1949 Act, which states that the Reserve Bank at any time may and on being directed so to do by the Central Government cause an inspection to be made by one or more of its officers of the books of account and to report to the Central Government on any inspection and the Central Government thereafter if it is of opinion after considering the report that the affairs of the banking company are being conducted to the detriment of the interests of its depositors, may prohibit the banking company from receiving fresh deposits or direct the Reserve Bank to apply under section 38 for the winding up of the banking company. Another important provision in the 1949 Act is found in section 27 which provides for monthly returns in the prescribed form and manner showing assets and liabilities. The power of the Reserve Bank under section 27 and 35 of the 1949 Act relates to the affairs of the banking company which comprehend the various forms of business of the bank mentioned in section 6 of the 1949 Act. Then again section 29 of the 1949 Act contemplates accounts relating to accounts of all business transacted by the bank. Section 35-A of the 1949 Act confers power on the Reserve Bank to give directions with regard to the affairs of a bank. These provisions indicate beyond any measure of doubt that all forms of business mentioned in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act are lawful, legitimate businesses of a bank as these have grown along with increase of trade and commerce. The word 'banking' has never had any static meaning and the only meaning will be the common understanding of men and the established practice in relation to banking. That is why all these disputed forms of business come within the legitimate business of a bank.

The next question is the legislative competence in regard to the Act of 1969. Counsel for the petitioner contended that the Act was for nationalisation of banks and there was no legislative entry regarding nationalisation and therefore that was incompetent. There is no merit in that contention. The Act is for acquisition of property; the undertaking of a banking company is acquired. The legislative competence is under Entry 42 in List III of the 7th Schedule and also under Entry 45 in List I of the 7th Schedule. Entry 42 in List III is acquisition and requisitioning of property. Entry 45 in List I is 'banking'. The Act of 1969 is valid under these entries. A question arose whether the Act of 1969 pertains to Entry 43 in List I which deals with incorporation, regulation and winding up of trading corporations including banks. It is not necessary to deal with that entry because of my conclusion as to entries No. 42 in List III and No. 45 in List I. Counsel for the petitioner contended that the Act of 1969 trenched upon Entry 26 in List II, namely trade and commerce within the State. I am unable to accept that contention for the obvious reason that the legislation is for acquisition of undertakings of banking companies. The pith and substance of the legislation is to be found out and meaning is to be given to the entries 'banking' and acquisition of property. In the case of *United Provinces v. Mst. Atiga Begum and others*¹, Gwyer, C. J., said that it would be practically impossible to define each item in the provincial legislation as to make it exclusive of every other item in that list and Parliament seems to have been content to take a number of comprehensive categories and to describe each of them by a word of broad and general import. The doctrine of pith and substance used in *Union Colliery Company of British Columbia v. Bryden*², is nothing but an illustration of the principle that when the legislation is referable to one or more entries the Courts try to find out what the pith and substance of the legislation is. In the present case the Act is beyond any doubt one for acquisition of property and is also in relation to banking. The legislation is valid with reference to the entries, namely, Entry 42 (Requisition) in List III, Entry 45 (Banking) in List I.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that undertaking of banking companies could not be the subject-matter of acquisition and acquisition of all properties in the undertaking must satisfy public purpose as contemplated in Article 31 (2). This contention was amplified to mean that undertaking was not property capable of being acquired and some assets like cash money could not be the subject-matter of acquisition. The Attorney General on the other hand contended first that undertaking is property within the meaning of Article 31 (2), secondly, undertaking in its normal meaning refers to going concern and thirdly it is a complete unit as distinct from the ingredients composing it and therefore it could not be said that acquisition of the undertaking was an infraction of any constitutional provision. The term 'undertaking' is explained in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Edition Volume 6 paragraph 75 at page 43 to mean not the various ingredients which go to make up an undertaking but the completed work from which the earnings arise. As an illustration reference is made to mortgage of the undertaking of a company.

In *Gardner v. London Chatham and Dover Railway Co.*³, the undertaking of a railway company which was pledged was held to be a railway which was to be made and maintained, by which tolls and profits were to be earned, which was to be worked and managed by a company, according to certain rules of management, and under a certain responsibility. In an undertaking there will be money for the working of the undertaking and money will be earned thereby. Again in *Re Panama, New Zealand and Australian Royal Mail Company*⁴, the undertaking of a steamship company was explained to have reference not only to all the property of the company which existed at the date of the debenture but which might become the property of the company and further that the word 'undertaking' referred to the application of funds which came into the hands of the company in the usual course of business. Undertaking will therefore relate to the entire business though there may be separate ingredients, or items of work or assets in the undertaking. The undertaking is going concern and it cannot be broken up into pieces to create a security over the undertaking [See *Re Portsmouth (Kingston, Fratton and Southsea) Tramway Co.*⁵, and *H.H. Vivian and Company Ltd.*⁶].

The word 'undertaking' is used in various statutes of our country, viz., the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, (Sections 6, 7, 7-A), Indian Companies, Act [Sections 125 (4) (f), 293 and 394] Banking Regulation Act, 1949 (Section 14-A), Cotton Textile Companies (Management of Undertaking, Liquidation and Reconstruction) Act, 1967 [Sections 4 (1), 5 (1) (2)]. By the word 'undertaking' is meant the entire organisation. These provisions indicate that the company whether it has a plant or whether it has an organisation is considered as one whole unit and the entire business of the going concern is embraced within the word 'undertaking.' In the case of sale of an undertaking as happened in *Doughly v. Lomagunda Reefs, Ltd.*⁷, the purchaser was required to pay all debts due by and to perform outstanding contracts comprised in the entire undertaking. The word 'undertaking' is used in the Indian Electricity Act, the Air Corporation Act, 1953, the Imperial Bank of India Act, 1920 (Sections 3, 4, 6 and 7), the State Bank of India Act, 1955 [Section 6 (1) (g)], the State Bank Subsidiaries Banks Act, 1959 [Section 10 (1)], the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 [Section 36-AE (1)] and there have been legislative provisions for acquisition of some of these undertakings.

Under section 5 of the Act of 1969 the undertaking of each existing bank shall be deemed to include all assets, rights, powers, authorities and privileges and all property, movable and immovable, cash balances, reserve funds, investments and all other rights and interests arising out of such property as were immediately before the commencement of this Act in the ownership, possession, power or control of the existing bank in relation to the undertaking. This Court accepted the meaning of property given by Rich, J., in the *Minister for State for the Army v. Dalziel*¹, to be a bundle of rights which the owner has over or in respect of a thing, tangible or intangible, or the word 'property' may mean the thing itself over or in respect of which the owner may exercise those rights. In the case of *Commissioner Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras v. Sri Lakshminidra Thirtha Swamiar of Sri Shirur Mutt*², this Court again gave wide meaning to the word 'property' and Mukherjea, J., said that there is no reason why the word 'property' as used in Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution should not be given a liberal and wide connotation and would not be extended to those well recognised types of interest which have the insignia or characteristics of proprietary right. In the case of *J.K. Trust, Bombay v. The Commissioner of Income-tax Excess Profits Tax, Bombay*³, this Court held the managing agency business to be a property. The undertaking of a bank will therefore be the entire integrated organisation consisting of all property, movable or immovable and the totality of undertaking is one concept which is not divisible into components or ingredients. That is why in relation to a company the word 'undertaking' is used in various statutes in order to reach every corner of property, right, title and interest therein. The decision in *State of Madhya Pradesh v. Ranajirao Shinde and another*⁴, is an authority for the proposition that money cannot be acquired under Article 31 (2). The impugned Act in *Ranajirao Shinde's*⁴, case abolished cash grants which the respondents were entitled to receive from the Government of Madhya Pradesh, but provided for the payment of certain compensation to the grantees. *Ranajirao Shinde's case*⁴ did not deal with the case of an undertaking and has therefore no application to the present case. The undertaking is an amalgamation of all ingredients of property and is not capable of being dismembered. That would destroy the essence and innate character of the undertaking. In reality the undertaking is a complete and complex web and the various types of business and assets are threads which cannot be taken apart from the web. I am, therefore, of opinion that undertaking of a banking company is property which can be validly acquired under Article 31 (2) of the Constitution.

The next question for consideration is whether Article 19 (6) of the Constitution is attacked. Counsel for the petitioner contended that as a result of the Constitution First Amendment Act, 1951, Article 19 (6) was clarified to the effect that the word 'restrictions' would include prohibition or exclusion which was dealt with in the second limb of Article 19 (6). It may be stated here that prior to the amendment of Article 19 (6) the second limb spoke only of law prescribing qualifications for practising any profession or carrying on any occupation, trade or business. As a result of the amendment, the second limb of Article 19 (6) consisted of two sub-articles the first sub-article relating to qualifications for practising profession or carrying on any occupation, trade or business and the second sub-article relating to carrying on by the State of trade, business industry to the exclusion complete or partial of citizens or otherwise. The second sub-article was really an enlargement of clause (6) of Article 19 as a result of the amendments. The main contention of Counsel for the petitioner was that the second limb of Article 19 (6) after the expression 'in particular' must also satisfy the test of reasonable restriction contained in the first limb of Article 19 (6) and emphasis was placed on the word 'in particular' to show that it indicated that the second limb was only an instance of the first limb spoke only of the prescribing qualifications for practising any profession enacted really to enable the State to carry on business to the exclusion, complete or partial of citizens or otherwise as will appear from the amendment of Article 19 (6).

In the case of *Akadasi Padhan v. State of Orissa*¹, this Court considered the Orissa Kendu Leaves (Control of Trade) Act, 1961 by which the State acquired monopoly in the trade of Kendu leaves and put restrictions on the fundamental rights of the petitioner. In that case, Gajendragadkar, J., speaking for the Court referred to the decision of the Allahabad High Court in *Motilal v. Government of the State of Uttar Pradesh*², where a monopoly of transport sought to be created by the U.P. Government in favour of the State operated Bus Service known as the 'Government Roadways' was struck down as unconstitutional because such a monopoly totally deprived the citizens of their rights and that is why Article 19 (6) came to be amended. The necessity of the amendment of Article 19 (6) was explained in the case of *Akadasi Padhan*¹. The view expressed by this Court in that case is that the two sub-articles of the second limb deal with two different forms of legislation. The first sub-article deals with restrictions on the exercise of the right to practise any profession or to carry on any trade, occupation or business. The second sub-article deals with carrying on by the State of any trade, business or industry to the exclusion, complete or partial of citizens or otherwise. The effect of the amendment was stated by Gajendragadkar, J., to be that a State Monopoly in respect of any trade or business must be presumed to be reasonable and in the interest of the general public so far Article 19 (1) (g) is concerned. The words 'in particular' in that case in Article 19 (6) were held to indicate that restrictions imposed on the fundamental rights guaranteed by Article 19 (1) (g) which are reasonable and which are in the interest of the general public are saved by Article 19 (6) as it originally stood and the validity of the laws covered by the amendment would no longer be left to be tried in Courts.

Counsel for the petitioner relied on the decision of the House of Lords in the case of *Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government and another*³, in support of the proposition that the words 'in particular' in Article 19 (6) were used to place the accent on reasonable restrictions in that clause as the saving feature of a law affecting Article 19 (1) (g). Section 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 which was considered was as follows :

"(1) The Central Land Board may, with the approval of the Minister, by agreement acquire land for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act, and in particular may so acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development."

It was held that the sub-section conferred a single power on the Central Land Board and not two powers, viz., that the boards have power to acquire land for the purpose connected with the performance of their functions and the words in the second limb of the section were no more than a particular instance of that which the Legislature regarded as part of the Board's functions. The purpose referred to in the second part of the sub-section there introduced by the words 'in particular' was held to be purpose connected with the performance of the function within meaning of the first part of the sub-section. The language of the sub-section in the case before the House of Lords is entirely different from the language in Article 19 (6). Article 19 (6) in the two limbs and in the two sub-articles of the second limb deals with separate matters and in any event State monopoly in respect of trade or business is not open to be reviewed in Courts on the ground of reasonableness. This Court in the case of *Municipal Committee of Amritsar v. State of Punjab*⁴, held that so far as monopoly business by the State was concerned under Article 19 (6) it was not open to challenge.

The four businesses which were disputed by Counsel for the petitioner to be within the business of banking were contended to be not only acquisition of property in violation of Article 19 (1) (f) but also not to be reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public under Article 19 (5) or under Article 19 (6). Emphasis was placed on section 15 (2) of the Act of 1969 to contend that after the acquisition of the undertaking of the bank the provision permitting the banks to carry on business other than banking would be empty and really amount to prohibition of carrying on of the business because the assets pertaining to the four disputed businesses with which the business could be carried on had been taken away. I have already expressed my opinion that the four disputed businesses are the legitimate businesses of a banking company as mentioned in section 6 (1) of the 1949 Act and are comprised in the undertaking of the bank and Article 19 (1) (f) is not attracted in case of acquisition or requisition of property dealt with by Article 31 (2). I have also held that Article 19 (6) confers power on the State to have a valid monopoly business. Section 15 (2) of the 1969 Act allows the existing banks to carry on business other than banking. If as a result of acquisition, the bank will complain of lack of immediate resources to carry on these businesses the Act provides compensation and the existing bank will devise ways and means for carrying on the businesses. Constitutionality of the Act cannot be impeached on the ground of lack of immediate resources to carry on business. In the present case, the acquisition is not constitutional and the bank is free to carry on all business other than banking. It cannot be suggested that after compensation has been provided for the State will have to provide moneys to enable the existing bank to carry on these businesses. That would be asking for something beyond the limits of the Constitution. If the entire undertaking of a banking company is taken by way of acquisition the assets cannot be separated to distinguish those belonging to banking business from other belonging to "non-banking business" because assets are not in fact divided on any such basis. Furthermore that would be striking at the root of acquisition of the entire undertaking. It would be strange to hold in the teeth of express provisions in the Act of 1969 permitting the banks to carry on business other than banking that the same will amount to a prohibition on the bank to carry on those businesses. I find it difficult to comprehend the contention of the petitioner that a permissive provision allowing the banks to carry on these businesses other than banking becomes unreasonable. If that provision was not there the businesses could be carried on and the argument would not be available at all. The express making of the provision obviously for greater safety cannot change the position. The petitioner's contention on Article 19 (6) therefore fails.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that section 11 of the 1969 Act suffered from the vice of excessive delegation and there were no guidelines for reaching the objectives set out in the Preamble of the Act and the decision of Government regarding policy involving public interest was made final and therefore it was unconstitutional. Section 11 of the Act of 1969 is in two sub-sections. The first sub-section enacts that corresponding new bank shall, in the discharge of its functions, be guided by such directions in regard to matters of policy involving public interest as the Central Government may after consultation with the Governor of the Reserve Bank, give. The second sub-section enacts that if any question arises whether a direction relates to a matter of policy involving public interest, it shall be referred to the Central Government and the decision of the Central Government thereon shall be final. Section 25 (1) (c) of the Act of 1969 provides that the words "corresponding new bank" constituted under section 3 of the 1969 Act or any other banking institution notified by the Central Government" shall be substituted for the words 'or any other banking institution notified by the Central Government in this behalf', in section 51 of the 1949 Act. Sections 7, 17 (15-A) of the Reserve Bank Act of 1934 contain similar powers on the part of the Central Government to give directions to the Reserve Bank in regard to management and exercise of powers and functions in performance of duties entrusted to the bank under the Reserve Bank Act. A statute of this nature whereby the controlling interest of the business of banks is acquired renders it not only necessary but also desirable that policy involving public interest should be left to the Government.

The Act of 1969 contains enough guidance. First, the Government may give directions only in regard to policy involving public interest; secondly directions can only be given by the Central Government and none else; Thirdly, these directions can only be given by the Central Government after consultation with the Governor of the Reserve Bank; fourthly, directions given by the Government are in regard to matters involving public interest which means that this is objective and subject to judicial scrutiny and both the Central Government and the Governor of Reserve Bank are high authorities.

As a result of section 25 (1) (c) of the Act of 1969, 14 banks will be subject to the provisions of the 1949 Act enumerated in sections 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 34, 35, 35-A, 36 and 48. These sections principally deal with restrictions as to payment of dividend, prohibition of floating charge on assets, creation of reserve fund, restrictions on subsidiary company, restrictions on loans and advances power of the Reserve Bank to control advances by banking companies, restrictions on the opening of new places of business, maintenance of percentage of assets, return of unclaimed deposits, furnishing of returns to the Reserve Bank publication of information by the Reserve Bank, submission of account and balance sheet to the Reserve Bank, inspection by the Reserve Bank, power of the Reserve Bank to give directions with regard to management, and imposition of penalties for contravention of the provisions of the Act.

There are other statutes which provide powers of the Central Government to give directions. I have already referred to the Reserve Bank of India Act, 1934. There are similar statutes conferring powers on the Government to give directions, namely, State Bank of India Act, 1955, State Financial Corporation Act, 1951, University Grants Commission Act, 1956, Life Insurance Act, 1956, Deposit Insurance Act, 1961, National Co-operative Development Corporation Act, 1962, Agricultural Refinance Corporation Act, 1963 and State Agricultural Credit Corporations Act, 1968. There are English statutes which contain similar provisions of exercise of power or directions by the Government in regard to the affairs of the undertakings covered by the statutes. These are the Bank of England Act, 1946, Cotton (Centralised Buying) Act, 1947, Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, Civil Aviation Act, 1946, Electricity Act, 1947, Gas Act, 1948, Iron and Steel Act, 1949 and Air Corporations Act, 1949. It is explicable that where the Government acquires undertakings of industries, the matters of policy involving public interest or national interest should be left to be decided by the Government. There is nothing unconstitutional in such provisions.

The Preamble to the Act of 1969 states that the object of the Act is "to serve better the needs of the development of the economy in conformity with national policy and objectives". National policy and objectives are in accordance with the Directive Principles in Part IV of the Constitution. It is stated by the respondents in their affidavits that there are needs of the development of the economy in conformity with the Directive Principles and these are to be achieved by a mobilisation of the savings of the community and employing the large resources of the 14 banks to develop national economy in several spheres of activity by a more equitable distribution of economic resources, particularly, where there are large credit gaps. In the case of *Harishankar Bagla another v. The State of Madhya Pradesh*¹, Mahajan, C.J., at pages 388-9 of the report said:

"The Preamble and the body of the sections sufficiently formulate the legislative policy and the ambit and character of the Act is such that the details of that policy can only be worked out by delegating them to a subordinate authority within the framework of that policy."

It is manifest that in working the Act of 1969 directions from the Central Government are necessary to deal with policy and other matters to serve the needs of national economy.

Counsel on behalf of the petitioner next contended that acquisition of the 14 banks and the prohibition of banking business by the existing banks violated

Article 301 and was not saved by Article 302 because it is not required in the public interest. As to the four disputed businesses which the existing banks can under the Act carry on, it was said that the same was an infraction of Article 301. Article 305 to my mind directly applies to a law relating to banking and all businesses necessarily incidental to it carried on by the State to the complete or partial exclusion of 14 banks. Article 302 can have no application in such a case. An individual cannot complain of violation of Article 301.

Article 305 applies in the present case and therefore neither Article 301 nor Article 302 will apply. Article 302 is an enabling provision and it has to be read in relation to Article 301. Acquisition of property by itself cannot violate Article 301 which relates to free trade, commerce throughout India. The object of acquisition is that the State shall carry on business to the exclusion, complete or partial, of the 14 banks.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that the 1969 Act violated the provisions of Article 14 on these grounds: First, the Act discriminated against 14 banks as against other Indian scheduled banks, secondly, the selection of 14 banks has no reasonable connection to the objects of the Act; thirdly, banks which may be described to be inefficient and which are liable to be acquired under section 36-AE of the 1949 Act are not acquired whereas 14 banks who have carried on their affairs with efficiency are acquired; fourthly under section 15 (2) (d) (e) of the 1969 Act the 14 banks cannot do any banking business whereas other Indian scheduled banks or any other new banking company can do banking business.

In order to appreciate these contentions it is necessary to remember the background of growth of Indian banks. At the beginning I referred to the position that State Bank of India and its several subsidiaries and the 14 banks occupy today in contrast with foreign banks and other scheduled or non-scheduled Indian banks. These 14 banks are not in the same class as other scheduled banks. The classification is on the basis of the 14 banks having deposit of Rs. 50 crores and over. The object of the Act is to control the deposit resources for developing national economy and as such the selection of 14 banks having regard to their larger resources, their greater coverage, their managerial and personnel resources and the administrative and organisational factor involved in expansion is both intelligible and related to the object of the Act. There is no evidence to show that the 14 banks are more efficient than the others as Counsel for the petitioner contended. Section 15 (2) (d) (e) of the 1969 Act states that these 14 banks after acquisition are not to carry on any banking business for the obvious reason that these 14 banks are not in the same class as the other Indian banks. Besides, it is also reasonable that the 14 banks should not be permitted to carry on banking business as the corresponding new banks. Therefore the classification of the 14 banks is also a rational and intelligible classification for the purposes of the Act. The object of the 1969 Act was to meet credit gaps and to have a wider distribution of economic resources among the weaker sections of the economy, namely, agricultural, small scale industry and retail trade.

The Act of 1969 is for development of national economy with the aid of banks. There are needs of various sectors. The Legislature is the best Judge of what should subserve public interest. The relative need is a matter of legislative judgment. The Legislature found 14 banks to have special features, namely, large resources and credit structure and good administration. The categorisation of Rs. 50 crores and over vis-a-vis other banks with less than Rs. 50 crores is not only intelligible but is also a sound classification. From the point of view of resources these 14 banks are better suited than others and therefore speed and efficiency which are necessary for implementing the objectives of the Act can be ensured by such classification.

In the case of *Shri Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Shri Justice S. R. Tendolkar and others*¹, it was said that the Court would take into consideration the history of the times and could also assume the state of facts existing at the time of legislation. A presumption also arises in regard to constitutionality of a piece of legislation. In the case of *P. V. Sivarajan v. The Union of India and another*¹, the Coir Industry Act was considered in relation to registration of dealers for export. The Act provided minimum quantity of export preceding 12 months the commencement of the Act as one of the qualifying terms for registration. This quantitative test was held good. The legislative policy as to the necessity is a matter of legislative judgment and the Court will not examine the propriety of it. The legislation need not be all embracing and it is for the Legislature to determine what categories will be embraced. In *Dalmia's case*², it was said that the two tests of classification were first that there should be an intelligible differentia which distinguished persons or things grouped from others left out and secondly the differentia must have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the statute. There has to be a line of demarcation somewhere and it is reasonable that these 14 banks which are in a class by themselves because of their special features in regard to deposit, credit, administration, organisation should be prohibited from carrying on banking business. These special circumstances are the reasons for classification. This distinction between the 14 banks and others reasonably justified different treatment. An absolute symmetry or an accurate classification is not possible to be achieved in the task of acquisition of undertakings of banking companies. It cannot, therefore, be said that companies whose deposits were in the range of Rs. 45 to Rs. 50 crores should have been taken.

1. (1959) S.C.R. 279 : (1959) S.C.J. 147 : (S.C.) 67.

In *Kathi Rawat v. State of Saurashtra*³, this Court said that the necessity for judicial enquiries would arise when there was an abuse of power and the differences would have no relation to the object. In the case of *The Board of Trustees, Ayazuddin and Unani Tibbia College, Delhi v. The State of Delhi and another*⁴, the Court supported legislation on a reasonable ground that the case of *Tibbia College*⁴, had exceptional features which were not found in others. In *Dalmia's case*², the Legislature was said to be free to recognise the degrees of harm and to confine its restriction to those cases where the need was deemed to be the greatest. It is in this sense that usefulness to society was found to form a basis of classification in the case of *Md. Hanif Qureshi v. State of Bihar*⁵. In the case of *Harnam Singh and others v. Regional Transport Authority, Calcutta and others*⁶ Mahajan, J., said that in considering Article 14 the Court should not adopt an attitude which might well choke all beneficial legislation and legislation which was based on a rational classification was permissible. It will not be sound to suggest that there are other banks which can be acquired and these 14 banks should be spared. There is always possibility of discerning some kind of inequality and therefore grouping has to be made. Where the Legislature finds that public need is great and these 14 banks will be able to supply that need for the development of national economy classification is reasonable and not arbitrary and is based on practical grounds and consideration supported by the large resources of over Rs. 50 crores of each of these 14 banks and their administration and management. I am, therefore, of opinion that the acquisition of the undertakings does not offend Article 14 because of intelligible differentia and their rational relation to the object to be achieved by the Act of 1969 and it follows that these banks cannot therefore be allowed to carry on banking business to nullify the very object of the Act.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that the Act of 1969 infringed Article 31 (a) because there was no just compensation. It was said that compensation in Article 31 (a) meant just compensation and if the 1969 Act did not aim at just compensation, it would be unconstitutional. It was contended that cash could not be taken and further that the four disputed businesses could not be acquired.

I have already expressed my view that the Act acquired the entire undertaking of the banks, and, therefore, there is no question of taking of cash. I have also expressed my view that the four disputed businesses are all within the business of bank, and, therefore, the Act is valid.

It was said by Counsel for the petitioner that the word 'compensation' in Article 31 (2) was given the meaning of just equivalent in earlier decisions of this Court and since the word 'compensation' was retained in Article 31 (2) after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955 there was no change in the meaning of the expression 'compensation' and it would have the same meaning of just equivalent. In view of the fact that after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act the question of adequacy of compensation is not justiciable it was said by Counsel for the petitioner that the only question for Courts is whether the law aimed at just equivalent. Counsel for the petitioner relied on the decision of this Court in *Vajravelu Mudaliar v. Special Deputy Collector, Madras and another*¹ and submitted that the decision in *State of Gujarat v. Shantilal Mangaldas*², was a wrong interpretation of Article 31 (2).

The Attorney General on the other hand contended first that after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, Article 31 (2) enacted that no law shall be called in question on the ground that the compensation provided by that law is not adequate and therefore compensation in that Article could not mean just equivalent. It was also said that Article 31 (2) refers to a law which provide for compensation and not to a law which aims at just equivalent. Secondly, it was said that the whole of Article 31 (2) had to be read and the meaning of the word 'compensation' in the first limb was to be understood by reference to the second limb and if the petitioner's arguments were accepted the Constitution would read that unless law provided for a just equivalent it shall be called in question. It was, therefore, said by the Attorney General that if just equivalent was to be aimed at the second limb of Article 31 (2), namely, that inadequacy would not be questioned would become redundant and meaningless. If the law enjoined that there was to be compensation and either principle for determination of compensation or amount of compensation was fixed the Court could not go into the question of adequacy or reasonableness of compensation and the Court could not also go into the question of result of application, propriety of principle or reasonableness of the compensation.

In *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, this Court referred to the decision of *Bela Banerjee's case*³, case where it was held that compensation in Article 31 (2) meant just equivalent or full indemnification. In *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, it was contended that the Land Acquisition Madras Amendment Act, 1961 had provided for acquisition of land for housing schemes and laid down principles for compensation different from those prescribed in the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 and thereby Article 31 (2) was infringed because the Act did not provide for payment of compensation within the meaning of Article 31 (2). Subba Rao, J., speaking for the Court said that if the terms 'compensation' had received judicial interpretation it must be assumed that the term was used in the sense in which it had been judicially interpreted unless a contrary intention appeared. That is how reference was made to the decision of this Court in *Bela Banerjee's case*³, to emphasise that a law for requisition or acquisition should provide for a just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of. Subba Rao, J., then dealt with the clause excluding the jurisdiction of the Court where the word 'compensation' was used and said at page 627 of the Report :

"The argument that the word 'compensation' means 'just equivalent' for the property acquired, and, therefore, the Court can ascertain whether it is just equivalent or not makes the amendment of the Constitution nugatory. It will be arguing in a circle. Therefore, a more reasonable interpretation is that neither the principles prescribing the 'just equivalent' nor the 'just equivalent' can be questioned by the Court on the ground of inadequacy of compensation fixed or arrived at by the working of the principles".

This Court then said that when value of a house at the time of acquisition had to be fixed there could be several methods of valuation, namely, estimate by engineer or value reflected by comparable sales or capitalisation of rent and similar others with the result that the adoption of one principle might give a higher value but they would nevertheless be principles of the manner in which the compensation has to be determined and the Court could not say that the Act should have adopted one principle and not the other because it would relate to the question of adequacy. In that case it was said that if a law lays down principles for determining compensation which are not relevant to the property acquired or to the value of the property at or about the time it is acquired it might be said that these are not principles contemplated by Article 31 (2). This was illustrated by saying that if a law says that though a house is acquired it would be valued as an agricultural land or though it is acquired in 1950 its value in 1930 should be given and though 100 acres are acquired only 50 acres will be paid for, these would not enter the question or area of adequacy of compensation. Another rule which was laid down in *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, is that the law may prescribe compensation which is illusory. To illustrate a property worth a lakh of rupees might be paid for at the sum of Rs. 100 and the question in that context would not relate to the adequacy of compensation because there was no compensation at all.

Two broad propositions which were laid down in *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*² are these. First, if principles are not relevant to the property acquired or not relevant to the value of the property at or about the time it is acquired, these are not relevant principles. The second proposition is that if a law prescribes a compensation which is illusory the Court could question it on the ground that it is not compensation at all.

In the case of *Shantilal Mangaldas*³, the Bombay Town Planning Act of 1950 which was repealed by the Bombay Town Planning Act of 1955 came up for consideration. There was a challenge to the Bombay Act of 1955 on the ground of infringement of Article 31 (2) of the Constitution. Section 53 of the Bombay Act contemplated transfer of ownership by law from private owners to the local authority. It was argued that under section 53 of the Bombay Act when a plot was reconstituted and out of that plot a smaller area was given to the owner and the remaining area was utilised for public purpose the area so utilised vested in the local authority for a public purpose, but the Act did not provide for giving compensation which was a just equivalent of the land expropriated at the date of extinction of interest and therefore Article 31 (2) was infringed. It was also argued that when the final scheme was framed in lieu of the ownership of the original plot and compensation in money was determined in respect of the land appropriated to public purpose such a scheme for compensation violated Article 31 (2) because compensation for the entire land was not provided and secondly payment of compensation in money was not provided in respect of the land appropriated to public use.

Shah, J., speaking for the Court in the case of *Shantilal Mangaldas*⁴, said that the decision of this Court in the cases of *Bela Banerjee*⁵, and *Subodh Gopal Bose*⁶, "raised more problems than they solved", because the Court did not indicate the meaning of just equivalent and "it was easier to state what was not just equivalent than to define what a just equivalent was." In this state of law Article 31 was amended by Constitution Fourth Amendment Act, 1955. Shah, J., said first that adequacy of compensation fixed by the Legislature or awarded according to principles specified by the Legislature is not justifiable and secondly if the amount of compensation is fixed it cannot be challenged apart from a plea of abuse of legislative power because otherwise it would be a challenge to the adequacy of compensation. In *Shantilal Mangaldas's case*¹, Shah, J., also said that the compensation fixed or determined on principles specified by the Legislature cannot be challenged on the indefinite plea that it is not a just or fair equivalent. Shah, J., further said that principles of compensation could not be challenged on the plea that what was awarded as a result of the application of those principles was not just or fair compensation.

If the quantum of compensation fixed by the Legislature is not liable to be challenged before the Court on the ground that it is not a just equivalent the principles specified for determination of compensation will also not be open to challenge on the plea that the compensation determined by the application of these principles is not a just equivalent. The right declared by the Constitution guarantees compensation before a person is compulsorily expropriated of the property for public purpose. Principles may be challenged on the ground that they are not relevant to the property acquired or the time of acquisition of the property but not on the plea that the principles are not relevant to the determination of a fair or just equivalent of the property acquired. A challenge to the statute that a principle specified by it does not provide or award a just equivalent will be a clear violation of the Constitutional declaration that inadequacy of compensation provided for is not justifiable.

Shah, J., referred to the decision of this Court in the case of *Union of India v. The Metal Corporation of India Ltd., and another*², and expressed disagreement with the following view expressed in the *Metal Corporation case*² "the law to justify itself has to provide a payment of just equivalent to the land acquired or lay down principles which will lead to that result. If the principles laid down are relevant to the fixation of compensation and are not arbitrary the adequacy of the resultant product cannot be questioned in the Court of law. The validity of the principles judged by the above tests falls within judicial scrutiny and if they stand the test the adequacy of the product falls outside justification". In *Metal Corporation case*² compensation was to be equated to the cost price in the case of unused machinery in good condition and written down value as understood in income-tax law was to be the value of the used machinery and both were said to be irrelevant to the fixation of the value of machinery as on the date of acquisition. Shah, J., speaking for the Court expressed inability to agree with that part of the judgment and then said "the Parliament has specified the principles for determining compensation of undertaking of the company. The principles expressly related to the determination of compensation payable in respect of unused machinery in good condition and used machinery. The principles were not irrelevant to the determination of compensation and the compensation was not illusory". If what is specified is a principle for determination of compensation the challenge to that principle on the ground that a just equivalent is not reached is barred by the plain words of Article 31 (2) of the Constitution.

These two decisions have one feature in common, namely, that if compensation is illusory the Court will be able to go into it. By the word "illusory" is meant something which is obvious, patent and shocking. If for a property worth Rs. 1 lakh compensation is fixed at Rs. 100 that would be illusory. One need not be astute to find out as to what would be at sight illusory. Furthermore, illusoriness must be in respect of the whole property and there cannot be illusoriness as to part in regard to the amount fixed or the result of application of principles laid down.

When principles are laid down in a statute for determination of compensation all that the Court will see is whether those principles are relevant for determination of compensation. The relevancy is to compensation and not to adequacy. I am unable to hold that when the relevant principle set out is "ascertained value" the petitioner could yet contend that market value should be the principle. It would really be going into adequacy of compensation by preferring the merits of the principle to those of the other for the oblique purpose of arriving at what is suggested to be just equivalent. To my mind it is unthinkable that the Legislature after the Constitution Fourth Amendment Act intended that the word 'compensation' would mean just equivalent when the Legislature put a bar on challenge to the adequacy of compensation. Just compensation cannot be inadequate and anything which is impeached as unjust or unfair is impinging on adequacy. Therefore, just equivalent cannot be the criterion in finding out whether the principles are relevant to compensation or whether compensation is illusory. In *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, the Court noticed continuous rise in land price but accepted an average price of 5 years as a principle. An average price over 5 years in the teeth of a continued rise in price would not aim at just equivalent according to the petitioner's contention there. Again potential value of land which was excluded in the Act in *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, was said there to pertain to the method of ascertaining compensation and its exclusion resulting in inadequacy of compensation. I am, therefore, of opinion that if the amount fixed is not obviously and shockingly illusory or the principles are relevant to determination of compensation, namely, they are principles in relation to property acquired or are principles relevant to the time of acquisition of property there is no infraction of Article 31 (2) and the owner cannot impeach it on the ground of 'just equivalent' of the property acquired.

Counsel on behalf of the petitioner contended that section 6 of the 1969 Act was an infraction of Article 31 (2) on these grounds. First, no time limit was mentioned with regard to payment of compensation is section 6 (1); secondly, section 6 (6) was an unreasonable restriction; thirdly, the four disputed businesses are not subject-matter of acquisition for public purpose; fourthly, debentures cannot be subject-matter of acquisition; fifthly, currency notes, cash, coins cannot be subject-matter of acquisition. It was said that securities and cash which are maintained under section 42 of the Reserve Bank Act, 1934 and section 24 of the 1949 Act can be taken but reserves and investments and shareholders' accumulated past profits cannot be subject-matter of acquisition and finally undertaking is not property and each asset is to be paid for.

Section 6 (1) of the Act provides for payment of compensation if it can be fixed by agreement and if agreement cannot be reached there shall be reference to a tribunal. There is no question of time within which agreement is to be reached or determination is to be made by a tribunal.

Section 6 (6) relates to interim payment of "one half of the amount of paid up share capital" and any existing bank may apply to the Central Government for such payment before the expiry of 3 months or within such further time not exceeding 3 months as the Central Government may by notification specify. If the bank will apply the Government will pay the money only if the bank agrees to pay to shareholders. Section 6 (6) is a provision for the benefit of the bank and the shareholders. There is no unreasonableness in it.

I have already held that the four disputed businesses come within the legitimate business of banks and therefore they are valid subject-matter of acquisition. No acquisition or requisition of the undertaking of the banking company is complete or comprehensive without all businesses which are incidental and conducive to the entire business of the bank.

The entire undertaking is the subject-matter of acquisition and compensation is to be paid for the undertaking and not for each of the assets of the undertaking. There is no uniform established principle for valuing an undertaking as a going concern but the usual principle is assets minus liabilities. If it be suggested that no compensation has been provided for any particular asset that will be questioning adequacy of compensation because compensation has been provided for the entire undertaking. The compensation provided for the undertaking cannot be called illusory because in the present case principles have been laid down. The Second Schedule of the Act of 1969 deals with the principles of compensation for the undertaking. The Second Schedule is in two parts. Part I relates to assets and Part II relates to liabilities. The compensation to be paid shall be equal to the sum total of the value of assets calculated in accordance with the provisions of Part I less the sum total of liabilities computed and obligations of existing banks calculated in accordance with the provisions of Part II. In Part I assets are enumerated.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that with regard to assets either there was no principle or the principle was irrelevant or the compensation was illusory or it was not just equivalent. As to securities, shares, debentures Part I (c) Explanation (iv) was criticised on the ground that there was no principle because period was not fixed and was left to be determined by some other authority. Explanations (iv) and (v) to Part I (c) will be operative only when market value of shares, debentures is not considered reasonable by reason of its having been affected by abnormal factors or when market value of shares debentures is not ascertainable. In the former case the basis of average market value over any reasonable period and in the latter case the dividend paid during 5 years and other relevant factors will be considered. In both cases principles have been laid down, namely, how valuation will be made taking into account various factors and these principles are relevant to determination of compensation for the property.

Part I (c) Explanation I was criticised by Counsel for the petitioner to be an instance of value being brought down from 'just equivalent'. Part I (c) Explanation 1 states that value shall be deemed to be market value of land or buildings, but where such market value exceeds the ascertained values determined in the manner specified in Explanation, 2 it shall be deemed to mean such ascertained value. This criticism suggests that compensation should be just equivalent meaning thereby that what is given is not just and, therefore, indirectly it is challenging the adequacy. In *Vajravelu Mudaliar's case*¹, there was a provision for compensation on the basis of the market value on the date of the notification or on the basis of average market value during past 5 years whichever was less. That principle was not held to be bad. The owner of the property is not entitled to just equivalent. Explanation 1 lays down the principle. Market value is not the only principle. That is why the Constitution has left the laying down of the principles to the Legislature. Ascertained value is a relevant and sound principle based on capitalisation method which is accepted for valuation of land and properties.

It was next said by Counsel for the petitioner that Explanation 2 (1) in Part I was an irrelevant principle because it was a concept borrowed from Income-tax Act for calculating income and not capital value. It was said that 12 times the annual rent was not a relevant principle and was not an absolute rule and compensation might be illusory. It was also said that Explanation 2 (1) would be irrelevant where 2 plots were side by side, one with building and the other vacant land because the latter would get more than the former and in the former standard rent was applied and the value of land was ignored and therefore it was an irrelevant principle. That will not be illusoriness. Standard rent necessarily takes into account value of land on which the building is situated because no rent can be thought of without a building situated on a plot of land. Article 31 (2) does not enjoin the payment of full or just equivalent or the payment of market value of land and buildings. There should be a relevant principle for determining compensation for the property acquired. Capitalisation method is not available for land because land is not generally let out. If rental method be applied to land the value may be little. In any event, it is a principle relevant to determination of compensation. Furthermore there was no case in the petition that there was land with building side by side with vacant land.

Another criticism with regard to Explanation 2 (1) (i) was that amount required for repairs which was to be deducted in finding out ascertained value should not be deducted against capital value. I am unable to accept the contention because this deduction on account of maintenance and repairs is essential in the capitalisation method. It was next said by Counsel for the petitioner that Explanation 2 (1) (ii) which speaks of deduction of insurance premium would reduce the value. Insurance would also be an essential deduction in the capitalisation method and it could not be assumed that the bank would insure for a value higher than what was necessary. Annual rent would also vary in different buildings. Amounts mentioned in Explanations 2 (i) (iii) and (iv) were said on behalf of the petitioner not to be deductible against capital value because annual charge or ground rent would be paid from income. These relate to Municipal tax and ground rent which are also taken into consideration in capitalisation method. Payment of tax or ground rent may be out of income but these have to be provided for in ascertaining value of the building under the capitalisation method.

Explanation 2 (i) (vi) which speaks of deduction of interest on borrowed capital with which any building was constructed was said to be included twice, namely, under Explanation 2 (i) (vi) and also under liabilities in Part II. Explanation 2 in Part I which relates to finding out ascertained value of building enacts that where building is wholly occupied 12 times the annual rent or the rent at which the building may be expected to let out less deductions mentioned therein would be the ascertained value. These deductions are made to arrive at the value of the building under the capitalisation method to find out how much will be paid in the shape of interest on mortgage or borrowed capital. Interest on mortgage or borrowed capital will be one of the deductions in calculating outgoing under capitalisation method. In Part II, the liabilities are those existing at the commencement of the Act and contingent liabilities which the corresponding new bank may reasonably be expected to be required to meet out of its own resources on or after the commencement of the Act. Interest payable on mortgage or borrowed capital at or after the commencement of the Act will not be taken into account as outgoings deducted under capitalisation method.

Explanation 2 (2) was criticised by Counsel for the petitioner on the ground that plinth area related to the floor area and if a floor was not occupied the plinth area thereof was not taken into account. Explanation 2 (i) relates to determination of compensation by finding out ascertained value in the case of building which is wholly occupied. Explanation 2 (2) relates to the case of a building which is partially occupied. Explanation 2 (3) refers to land on which no building is erected or which is not appurtenant to any building. In the case of partial occupation Explanation 2 (2) sets out the principle of compensation of partially occupied building. Again in Explanation 2 (3) the criticism on behalf of the petitioner that if there is a garage or one storeyed structure the principle will not apply is explained on the ground that the expression 'appurtenant' means land belonging to the premises. If there is a small garage or a one storeyed building the land will not be appurtenant to the garage or building.

Counsel for the petitioner contended that Part I (h) which spoke of market or realisable value of other assets did not include goodwill, benefit of contract, agencies claims in litigation, and, therefore, there was no compensation for these. Part I (h) is a residuary provision. Whatever appears in books would be included. Goodwill does not appear in the books. Goodwill may arise when an undertaking is sold as a going concern. The contention as to exclusion of goodwill goes to the question of adequacy and will not vitiate the principle of valuation which has been laid down. Reference may be made to Schedule VI of the Companies Act which refers to goodwill under Fixed Assets but the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 does not contain goodwill under property and assets.

Goodwill in the words of Lord Eldon in *Grutwell v. Lye*¹, means "the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place". The term 'goodwill' is generally used to denote the benefit arising from connection and reputation. Whether or not the goodwill has a saleable value the question of fact is to be determined in each case. Upon sale of a business there may be restriction as to user of the name of the business sold. That is another aspect of sale of goodwill of a business. The 14 banks carried on business under licence by reason of section 22 of the Act of 1949. The concept of sale in such a situation is unreal. Furthermore, the possibility of nationalisation of undertakings like banks cannot be ruled out. Possibility of nationalisation will affect the value of goodwill. In the case of compulsory acquisition it is of grave doubt whether goodwill passes to the acquiring authority. No facts have been pleaded in the petition to show as to what goodwill the bank has. Goodwill is not shown in assets. In the present case the names of the 14 banks and the corresponding new banks are not the same and it cannot therefore be said that any goodwill has been transferred. The 14 banks will be able to carry on business other than banking in their names. Again under the Act compensation is being paid for the assets and secret reserves which are provided for by depreciating the value of assets will also be taken into account. Any challenge as to compensation for goodwill falls within the area of adequacy.

As to Part II of the Schedule Counsel for the petitioner said that liabilities not appearing in the books would be deducted but in the case of assets only those appearing in the books will be taken into account. Nothing has been shown in the petition that there are assets apart from those appearing in the books. It would not be appropriate to speak of liabilities like current income-tax liability, gratuity, bonus claims as liabilities appearing in the books.

It was said on behalf of the petitioner that interest from the date of acquisition was not provided for. That would again appertain to the adequacy of compensation. Furthermore, interest has been provided for under section 6 (3) (a), (b) of the 1969 Act. It was also said that if there was a large scale sale of promissory notes or stock certificates the value would depreciate. Possibility of depreciation does not vitiate the principle or constitutionality of a measure.

The principles which have been set out in the 1969 Act are relevant to the determination of compensation. When it is said that principles will have to be relevant to the compensation, the relevancy will not be as to adequacy of compensation but to the property acquired and the time of acquisition. It may be that adoption of one principle may confer lesser sum of money than another but that will not be a ground for saying that the principle is not relevant. The criticism on behalf of the petitioner that compensation was illusory is utterly unmeritorious.

The Attorney-General contended that even if Article 19 (1) (f) or 19 (1) (g) applied, the 1969 Act would be upheld as a reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public. It is said that social control scheme is a constitutional way of fulfilling the Directive Principles of State Policy. The 14 banks paid a total of 4.35 crores of rupees as dividend in 1968. This amount is said in the affidavit of the respondent not to be of great significance and that the bank should expand and attract more deposits. The comparative position of India along with other countries is focussed in the study group Report referred to in the affidavit in opposition. Commercial bank deposits and credit as proportion of national income form hardly 14 per cent. and 10 per cent. respectively in India as against 84 per cent. and 19 per cent. in Japan, 56 per cent. and 36 per cent. in U.S.A. 49 per cent. and 29 per cent. in Canada whereas the average population served in India by banks is as high as 73,000 as against 4000 in U.S.A. and Canada and 15,000 in Japan. Then it is said that more than 4/5th of the credit goes to industry and commerce, retail has about 2 per cent and agriculture less than 1 per cent. Small borrowers it is said have no facilities. It is said that institutional credit is virtually non-existent in relation to small borrowers. The suggestion is that there is flow of resources from smaller to larger population and from rural to urban centres. There are many places which have no banks. In different States there is uneven spread of banking offices. There is greater expansion in urban banking. 5 major cities are said to have 46 per cent. deposit but 65 per cent. credit. Banks are more developed in States which are economically and socially advanced but even in such developed States banks are sparsely located.

India is a predominantly agricultural country and one-half of national income viz., 53.2 per cent, is from agriculture. Out of 5,64,000 villages only 5000 are served by banks. Not even 1 per cent. have bank facilities. Credit requirements for agriculture are of great importance. Agriculturists have 34 per cent. credit from Co-operatives, 5 per cent. from banks and the rest from money lenders. The requirements are said to be Rs. 2,000 crores for agriculturists. The small-scale industries are said to employ one-third of the total industrial population and 40 per cent of the industrial workers are in small scale industries. Banks will have to meet their needs. Small artisans and retail trade have all need for credit. It is said that barely 1.8 per cent. of the total bank advances goes to small-scale industries. It is said in the affidavit that the policy of the Government is to take up direct management of credit resources for massive expansion of branches, vigorous principles for mobilisation of deposits and wide range programme to fill the credit gaps of agriculture, small-scale industries, small artisans, retail trade and consumer credit. This policy can be achieved only by direct management by State and not merely by social control. Almost all the banks are in favour of large-scale industry. This direct control and expansion of bank credit is intended to make available deposit resources and expand the same to serve the country in the light of Directive Principles. These are the various reasons which are rightly said by the Attorney General to be reasonable restrictions in the interest of the general public. I wish to make it clear that in my opinion Articles 19 (1) (f) and (g) do not at all enter the domain of Article 31 (2) because a legislation for acquisition and requisition of property for public purpose is not required to be tested again on the touchstone of reasonableness of restriction. Such reasonable restriction is inherent and implicit in public purpose. That is why public purpose is dealt with separately in Article 31 (2).

The validity of the Ordinance of 1969 was challenged by contending that the satisfaction of the President under Article 123 was open to challenge in a Court of law. It was said that the satisfaction of the President was objective and not subjective. The power of the President under Article 123 of the Constitution to promulgate Ordinances is when both the Houses of Parliament are not in session and this power is co-extensive with that of the Legislature and the President exercises this power when he is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action. The power of promulgating Ordinance is of historical antiquity and it has undergone change from time to time. In the East India Company Act, 1773 under section 36 the Governor-General could promulgate Ordinance. The Indian Councils Act, 1861 by section 23 thereof provided that the Governor-General in case of emergency may promulgate an Ordinance for the peace and good Government of the territories. The Government of India Act, 1915 provided in section 72 that the Governor-General could promulgate Ordinances for the peace and good Government. The Government of India Act, 1935 by sections 42, 43 and 45 conferred power on the Governor-General to promulgate Ordinances and sections 88 and 89 conferred a similar power on the Governor. Article 123 of the Constitution is really based on section 42 of the Government of India Act, 1935 and Article 213 which relates to the power of the Governor in the States is based on section 88 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

It has been held in several decisions like *Bhagat Singh's case*¹ and *Sibnath Banerjee's case*² that the Governor-General is the sole Judge as to whether an emergency exists or not. The Federal Court in *Lakshmi Narain Singh's case*³, took a similar view that the Governor-General was the sole Judge of the State of emergency for promulgating Ordinances.

The sole question is whether the power of the President in Article 123 is open to judicial scrutiny. It was said by Counsel for the petitioner that the Court would go into the question as to whether the President was satisfied that circumstances existed which rendered it necessary for the President to promulgate an Ordinance. Liversidge's case¹ was relied upon by Counsel for the petitioner. That case interpreted the words "reasonable cause to believe". It is obvious that when the words used are "reasonable cause to believe" it is to be found out whether the cause itself has reason to support it and the Court goes into the question of ascertaining reasons. In *Liversidge's case*¹ it was said that the words "has reasons to believe" meant an objective belief whereas the words "if it appears" or "if satisfied" would be a subjective satisfaction.

The words "if it appears" came up for consideration in two English cases of *Ayr Collieries*², and the *Carltona*³, and the decision was that it was not within the province of the Court to enquire into the reasonableness of the policy.

The interpretation of Article 123 is to be made first on the language of the Article and secondly the context in which that power is reposed in the President. When power is conferred on the President to promulgate Ordinances the satisfaction of the President is subjective for these reasons. The power in Article 123 is vested in the President who is the executive head and the circumstances contemplated in Article 123 are a guide to the President for exercise of such power. Parliament is not in session throughout the year and during the gaps between sessions the legislative power of promulgating Ordinance is reposed in the President in cases of urgency and emergency. The President is the sole Judge whether he will make the Ordinance. The President under Article 74 (1) of the Constitution acts on the advice of Ministers. Under Article 74 (2) the advice of the Ministers is not to be enquired into by any Court. The Ministers under Article 75 (3) are responsible to Parliament. Under Article 123 the Ordinances are limited in life and the Ordinance must be laid before Parliament and the life of the Ordinance may be further shortened. The President under Article 361 (1) is not answerable to any Court for acts done in the performance of his duties. The Ministers are under oath of secrecy under Article 75 (4). Under Article 75 (3) the Ministers are collectively responsible to the House of the People. Under Article 78 it shall be the duty of the Prime Minister to furnish information to the President. The power under Article 123 relates to policy and to an emergency when immediate action is considered necessary and if any objective test is applied the satisfaction of the President contemplated in Article 123 will be shorn of the power of the President himself and as the President will be acting on the advice of Ministers it may lead to disclosure of facts which under Article 75 (4) are not to be disclosed. For these reasons it must be held that the satisfaction of the President is subjective.

Counsel for the petitioner relied on the decisions of this Court in the cases of Barium Chemicals,⁴ and *Rohtas Industries*⁵. In both the cases the words used in the Companies Act, 1956 section 237(b) which came up for consideration before this Court are to the effect that the Central Government may, if in the opinion of the Central Government there are circumstances suggesting, that the business of the company is not properly conducted, appoint competent persons to investigate the affairs of the company. The opinion which is to be formed by the Central Government under the Companies Act in that section is in relation to various facts and circumstances about the business of a company and that is why this Court came to the conclusion that the existence of circumstances but not the opinion was open to judicial scrutiny. This was the view of this Court in the cases of *Barium Chemicals*⁴ and *Rohtas Industries Ltd*⁵.

The decisions in *Barium Chemicals*⁴, and *Rohtas Industries Ltd*⁵, turned on the interpretation of section 237 of the Companies Act and executive acts thereunder. The language used in that section is 'in the opinion of.' The Judicial Committee in the *Hubli Electricity case*⁶, interpreted the words "the Provincial Government may, if in its opinion the public interest so requires, revoke a licence in any of the following cases" to mean that the relevant matter was the opinion and not the ground on which the opinion was based. This Court in the *Barium Chemicals case*¹, however found that there were no materials upon which the authority could form the requisite opinion. That is the ratio of the decision in *Barium Chemicals case*¹.

In order to entitle the Central Government to take action under section 237 of the Companies Act, 1956 there is to be the requisite opinion of the Central Government and the circumstances should exist to suggest that the company's business was being conducted as laid down in sub-clause (1) or that the persons mentioned in sub-clause (2) were guilty of fraud, misfeasance or misconduct. The opinion of the Central Government was subjective but it was said that the condition precedent to the formation of such opinion was that there should be circumstances in existence and the recitals of the existence of those circumstances did not preclude the Court from going behind those recitals and determining whether in fact the circumstances existed and whether the Central Government in making the order had taken into consideration any extraneous consideration.

In the case of *Rohas Industries*², reference was made to English, Canadian and New Zealand decisions. The Canadian decision related to power of the Liquor Commission to cancel the liquor licence and it was held to be an exercise of discretion. The New Zealand decision related to the power of the Governor-General under the Education Act to make Regulations as "he thinks necessary to secure the due administration." It was held that the opinion of the Governor General, as to the necessity for such regulation was not reasonably tenable. These decisions do not deal with questions as to whether the satisfaction is subjective or objective. Of the two English decisions one related to the power of the Commissioner to make regulations providing for any matter for which provisions appear to them to be necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the Act. The nature of legislation was taxation of subjects. It was held that the authority was not the sole judge of what its powers were, nor of the way in which that power was exercised. The words "reasonable cause to believe," "reasonable grounds to believe" occurring in the case of *Liversidge*³, were relied on to illustrate the power of the Court to find out as to whether the regulations was intra vires in the English case.

The decision of the House of Lords in *Padfield v. Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food*⁴, on which Counsel for the petitioner relied turned on interpretation of section 19 (3) of the Agricultural Marketing Act which contemplated a committee of investigation, if the Minister so directed, to consider and report to the Minister on any report made by the consumer committee and any complaint made to the Minister as to the operation of any scheme which in the opinion of the Minister could not be considered by a consumers' committee under one of the sub-sections in that section. The House of Lords held that the Minister had full or unfettered discretion but he was bound to exercise it lawfully that is to say not to misdirect himself in law, nor to take into account irrelevant matters nor to omit relevant matters from consideration. That was an instance of a writ of mandamus directing exercising of discretion to act on the ground that it was a power coupled with duty.

The only way in which the exercise of power by the President can be challenged is by establishing bad faith or mala fide and corrupt motive. Bad faith will destroy any action. Such bad faith will be a matter to be established by a party propounding bad faith. He should affirm the state of facts. He is not only to allege the same but also to prove it. In the present case there is no allegation of mala fide.....

It was said on behalf of the petitioner that the fact that Parliament would be in session on 21st July, 1969 and that the Ordinance was promulgated on Saturday, 19th July, 1969 was indicative of the fact that the Ordinance was not promulgated legitimately but in a hasty manner and the President should have waited. If the President has power when the House is not in session he can exercise that power when he is satisfied that there is an emergency to take immediate action. That emergency may take place even a short time before Parliament goes into session. It will depend upon the circumstances which were before the President. The fact that the Ordinance was passed shortly before the Parliament session began does not show any mala fide. It was said that circumstances were not set out in the affidavit and therefore the Court was deprived of examining the same. The Attorney-General rightly contended that it was not for the Union to furnish facts and information which were before President because first such information might be a State secret, secondly, it was for the party who alleged non-existence of circumstances to prove the same and thirdly the respondent was not called upon to meet any case of mala fide.

It was said that no reason was shown as to what mischief could have happened if the Ordinance would not have been promulgated on the date in question but no reason was required to be shown. The statement of objects and reasons shows that there was considerable speculation in the country regarding Government's intention with regard to 'nationalisation' of banks during few days immediately before the Ordinance. In the case of *Barium Chemicals*¹, it was said by this Court that if circumstances lead to tentative conclusion, that the Court would not have drawn a similar inference would be irrelevant. The reason is obvious that in matters of policy just as Parliament is the master of its province similarly the President is supreme and sole judge of his satisfaction on such policy matters on the advice of the Government.

The locus standi of the petitioners was challenged by the Attorney-General. The petitions were heard on merits. I have dealt with all the arguments advanced. It is, therefore, not at all necessary to deal with this objection.

For the reasons mentioned above, the petitions fail and are dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

ORDER—In accordance with the opinion of the majority Petitions Nos. 300 and 298 are allowed, and it is declared that the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act XXII of 1969 is invalid and the action taken or deemed to be taken in exercise of the powers under the Act is declared unauthorised. Petition No. 222 is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs in these three petitions.

in the reserved or selected area of the landowner. Under section 18 (2) the Assistant Collector is only authorised to determine the value of the land after making such enquiries as he thinks fit. He is not expressly authorised to go into the question whether the land sought to be purchased is included in the reserved or selected area of the landowner or not. But, obviously it must be the intention that he should go into these questions before embarking on determining the price. But by wrongly deciding that question he cannot finally confer on himself jurisdiction to deal with the matter. In the exercise of the powers under section 24 of the Act, read with section 84 of the Tenancy Act, the Financial Commissioner had jurisdiction to go into the question whether the Assistant Collector or Collector had rightly assumed jurisdiction. The Financial Commissioner did not appreciate the content of his powers of revision under section 24 read with section 84 of the Tenancy Act. It was obvious from the report of the Commissioner that if the finding arrived at by the Commissioner was accepted the Assistant Collector and the Collector had no jurisdiction. Therefore, the Financial Commissioner should have gone into the question whether the Commissioner's report was acceptable or not on merits. Because the Financial Commissioner had not gone into the jurisdictional fact whether the land sought to be purchased by Surja was part of the reserved or related area, his order dismissing the revision has to be set aside.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Order dated the 25th May, 1965 of the Punjab High Court in Letters Patent Appeal No. 146 of 1965.

S. V. Gupta, Senior Advocate, (Nannit Lal, Advocate, with him), for Appellant.

A. K. Sen, Senior Advocate, (S. G. Mohatta and A. D. Mathur, Advocates, with him), for Respondent No. 1.

V. C. Mahajan and R. N. Sachdev, Advocates, for Respondents Nos. 2, 3 and 4.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Sikri J.—This appeal by Special Leave is directed against the judgment and order of the High Court of Punjab in Letters Patent Appeal No. 146 of 1965 whereby the High Court dismissed in limine the Letters Patent Appeal filed by the appellant Surja against the judgment of the learned Single Judge allowing the writ petition filed by the respondent, Hardeva.

The relevant facts for determining the points raised before us are as follows : Hardeva, respondent before us, is a big landlord of village Panniwala Mota in Sirsa Tahsil of Hissar District. Surja, the appellant, was an old tenant of Hardeva and had been cultivating the land in dispute since about 1949. Section 18 of the Punjab Security of Land Tenures Act, 1953 (Punjab Act X of 1953)—hereinafter referred to as the Act—entitles a tenant of a land-owner other than a small land-owner to purchase from the land-owner the land held by him, but not included in the reserved area of the land-owner if he satisfies the conditions laid down in that section. Section 18 (1) and (2) may be set out.

“18 (1) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any law, usage or contract, a tenant of a land-owner other than a small land-owner—

(i) who has been in continuous occupation of the land comprised in his tenancy for a minimum period of six years, or

(ii) who has been restored to his tenancy under the provisions of this Act and whose periods of continuous occupation of the land comprised in his tenancy immediately before ejection and immediately after restoration of his tenancy together amounts to six years or more, or

(iii) who was ejected from his tenancy after the 14th day of August, 1947, and before the commencement of this Act, and who was in continuous occupation of the land comprised in his tenancy for a period of six years or more immediately before his ejection, shall be entitled to purchase from the land-owner the land so held by him but not included in the reserved area of the land-owner, in the case of a tenant falling within clause (i) or clause (ii) at any time, and in the case of a tenant falling within clause (iii) within a period of one year from the date of commencement of this Act:

Provided that no tenant referred to in this sub-section shall be entitled to exercise any such right in respect of the land or any portion thereof if he had sublet the land or the portion, as the case may be, to any other person during any period of his continuous occupation, unless during that period the tenant was suffering from a legal disability or physical infirmity, or, if a woman, was a widow or was unmarried:

Provided further that if the land intended to be purchased is held by another tenant who is entitled to pre-empt the sale under the next preceding section, and who is not accepted by the purchasing tenant, the tenant in actual occupation shall have the right to pre-empt the sale.

(2) A tenant desirous of purchasing land under sub-section (1) shall make an application in writing to an Assistant Collector of the First Grade having jurisdiction over the land concerned, and the Assistant Collector, after giving notice to the land-owner and to all other persons interested in the land and after making such inquiry as he thinks fit, shall determine the value of the land which shall be the average of the prices obtaining for similar land in the locality during 10 years immediately preceding the date on which the application is made."

Surja accordingly applied on 5th August, 1957, to the Collector, Hissar District, stating that he intended to purchase the land in dispute and that the land is outside the reserved area of the land-owner. He further alleged that he had been in possession of the land for the last eight years. Hardeva in his written statement inter alia, stated that Surja was in possession of the land only for three or four years. He alleged that Surja had already 150 bighas of cultivable land. He further stated that the land is reserved and for that reason Surja was not entitled to purchase it. In his evidence before the Assistant Collector given on 25th March, 1958, Hardeva deposed :

"The land is reserved. I do not know whether the land in dispute is reserved or not."

By his order dated 31st March, 1959, the Assistant Collector, Sirsa, held that Surja was entitled to purchase the land in dispute, and, accordingly, fixed the price. Regarding reservation he observed:

"It is admitted by the respondent that they are big land-owners and got this land reserved, but later on during his very cross examination, he denied any knowledge about the reservation. The respondent produced no evidence with regard to having this land got reserved though they are big land-owners."

Hardeva thereupon filed an appeal before the Collector, and one of the grounds taken was that the Assistant Collector erred in holding that the land in dispute was not reserved land. The Collector, by his order dated 20th July, 1960, dismissed the appeal. It was common ground before him that Hardeva was a big land-owner and that Surja had been in continuous possession of the land in dispute for more than six years, and the only point he determined was whether with the addition of the 28 bighas, and 12 biswas of land which Surja had been permitted to purchase his total area would exceed the permissible area or not. On this point he held in favour of Surja and accordingly dismissed the appeal.

Hardeva then filed a revision before the Commissioner. In the grounds of revision dated 27th October, 1960, various grounds were taken but there was no ground regarding reservation of land or selection of land under section 5-B of the Act. On 1st February, 1961, Hardeva filed an application in the Court of the Commissioner. In this application he stated that the entire land in dispute was included in the permissible area selected by him under section 5-B of the Act by submitting form "E". He further stated that the Financial Commissioner had in *Karam Singh v. Angrez Singh*¹, held that selection under section 5-B (1) had the same force as reservation under section 5 of the Act, and this disentitled Surja from purchasing the land in dispute. He prayed that he may be allowed to raise the plea of selection under section 5-B (1). He stated that this plea involved a question of jurisdiction and in the interest of justice he may be permitted to raise this plea as an additional ground of revision.

The Commissioner allowed the ground to be taken but as Surja's Counsel suspected the bona fide of the selection, the Commissioner sent for the original file and he satisfied himself, after examining the original form "g" and the affidavit in relation to form "g", that Hardeva had duly submitted the selection document to the Collector within time on 19th June, 1958. It appears that the Financial Commissioner had held in *Dhanpat Rai v. State of Punjab*², that the period of six months allowed by section 5-B for making selection would start from 22nd March, 1958, the date when the Punjab Government Notification prescribing the form was issued. The Commissioner felt that the selected land could not be purchased under section 18 by the tenant. He accordingly submitted the case to the Financial Commissioner with the recommendation that the revision petition be accepted and that the orders of the Assistant Collector and the Collector be set aside.

The Financial Commissioner dismissed the revision. He held that as Hardeva had not put forward the plea of selection before the Assistant Collector or the Collector he could not be allowed to do so at that stage. He observed:

"In other words the consideration that reservation of area under section 5 and selection of area under section 5-B are identical in their effect has no relevance in the present cases for the reasons that it was never claimed (except in revision) that the area had been selected under section 5-B. If such a claim had been made and substantiated, the position would have been different, but since this was not done, the decision against the petitioner cannot be challenged. It is also clear that there is no question in these cases of the authorities concerned having acted without jurisdiction or having exercised it with illegality or material irregularity which alone could justify interference in revision."

Hardeva then filed a petition under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution. The High Court held that the Financial Commissioner should have accepted the recommendation made by the Commissioner and accordingly allowed the petition and declared that Surja was not entitled to purchase the land in dispute selected by the land-owner under the provisions of section 5-B of the Act. The learned Single Judge was of the view that the disputed question relates to jurisdiction and went to the root of the whole matter.

It appears that there was some dispute before the learned Single Judge about the date of the selection, because the learned Judge observed:

"There is a slight dispute on the question whether the intimation of selection was given on 19th or 20th of June, 1958."

He, however, preferred to accept the finding of the learned Commissioner on the point and gave the land-owner the benefit of it. He further observed that the question could not have been raised before the Assistant Collector and the Collector because "the prevailing view up till 1960 appears to have been that the selected area had not been equated with the reserved area" and it was because of this that Hardeva had not placed it before the Assistant Collector and the Collector although he had placed the point that the area was part of the reserved area.

It seems to us that the High Court was right in holding that the question whether the land sought to be purchased by Surja was part of the reserved or selected area was a jurisdictional fact. Under section 18 of the Act a tenant is only entitled to purchase land which is not included in the reserved or selected area of the land-owner. Under section 18 (2) the Assistant Collector is only authorised to determine the value of the land after making such enquiries as he thinks fit. He is not authorised expressly to go into the question whether the land sought to be purchased is included in the reserved or selected area of the land-owner or not. But, obviously it must be the intention that he should go into these questions before embarking on determining the price. But by wrongly deciding that question he cannot finally confer on himself jurisdiction to deal with the matter. In exercise of the powers under section 24 of the Act, read with section 84 of the Tenancy Act, the Financial Commissioner had jurisdiction to go into the question whether the Assistant Collector or the Collector had rightly assumed jurisdiction.

It was urged before us that the orders of the Assistant Collector and the Collector were final and could not be assailed on the ground that they had wrongly assumed jurisdiction. Reliance was placed on authorities like *Rai Brij Raj Krishna v. S. K. Shaw*¹, where this Court referred to *Queen v. Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income-tax*², and *Colonial Bank of Australia v. Willen*³. That was a case of a suit whereby the order of the Commissioner under the Bihar Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Control Act, 1947 (section 11) was sought to be declared illegal, ultra vires and without jurisdiction, but we are concerned with the revisional power of the Financial Commissioner which is the same as that of the High Court. As observed by Kapur, J., speaking for the Court, in *Ghaube Jagdish Prasad v. Ghaturvedi*⁴ these cases have no application to the exercise of revisional power. He observed :

"The appellant also relied on *Rai Brij Raj Krishna v. S.K. Shaw and Brothers*¹, where this Court quoted with approval the observations of Lord Esher in *Queen v. Commissioner for Special Purposes of the Income-tax*² and *Colonial Bank of Australia v. Willen*³, where Sir James Colville said :—

"Accordingly the authorities..... establish that an adjudication by a Judge having jurisdiction over the subject-matter is, if no defect appears on the face of it, to be taken as conclusive of the facts stated therein and that the Court of Queen's Bench will not on certiorari quash such an adjudication on the ground that any such fact, however, essential, has been erroneously found."

But these observations can have no application to the judgment of the Additional Civil Judge whose jurisdiction in the present case is to be determined by the provisions of section 5 (4) of the Act. And the power of the High Court to correct questions of jurisdiction is to be found within the four corners of section 115. If there is an error which falls within this section the High Court will have the power to interfere, not otherwise.

The only question to be decided in the instant case is as to whether the High Court had correctly interfered under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure with the order of the Civil Judge. As we have held above, at the instance of the landlord the suit was only maintainable if it was based on the inadequacy of the reasonable annual rent and for that purpose the necessary jurisdictional fact to be found was the date of the construction of the accommodation and if the Court wrongly decided that fact and thereby conferred jurisdiction upon itself which it did not possess, it exercised jurisdiction not vested in it and the matter fell within the rule laid down by the Privy Council in *Jay Chandlal Babu v. Kamalkasha Chaudhary*⁵. The High Court had the power to interfere and once it had the power it could determine whether the question of the date of construction was rightly or wrongly decided. The High Court held that the Civil Judge had wrongly decided that the construction was of a date after 30th June, 1946, and therefore fell within section 3-A.⁶ Similarly, in *Jagan Nath Ramachandra Datar v. Dattaraya Belwant Hingmire*⁶, this Court observed :

"Therefore if it can be shown that the subordinate Court without any evidence whatsoever held that the transaction in question was not a sale but a mortgage and that the relationship between the parties was that of a debtor and a creditor and on that footing proceeded to exercise its power under section 3 and 10-A of the Dekhan Agriculturists Relief Act the High Court would be entitled to interfere with such a decision under both the parts of section 115. It would then be possible to say that the subordinate Court had clutched at jurisdiction which it had not under the said section and it would also be possible to say that that Court had exercised its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity."

It seems to us that the Financial Commissioner did not appreciate the content of his powers of revision under section 24, read with section 84 of the Tenancy Act. It was obvious from the report of the Commissioner that if the finding arrived at by the Commissioner was accepted the Assistant Collector and the Collector had no jurisdiction in the matter.

In our opinion the Financial Commissioner should have gone into the question whether the Commissioner's report was acceptable or not on merits.

It is urged by the learned Counsel for Surja that the High Court did not decide the question whether the selection had been properly made within time, but it merely accepted the report of the Commissioner. He, therefore, still dispute the fact that the selection was made within time. He also says that it is not a genuine and valid selection. These points should be gone into by the Financial Commissioner. Under these circumstances we allow the appeal, set aside the orders passed by the High Court and the Financial Commissioner and remit the case to the Financial Commissioner to dispose of the revision filed before him in accordance with law.

There will be no order as to costs in this appeal.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 136—Appeals by Special Leave against the interim injunctions granted by the trial Judge—Ordinarily Court not interfering with interim orders—Irrevocable letter of credit, a mechanism of great importance in international trade—awarding of an irrevocable letter of credit entitled to protection—Courts not to interfere with that mechanism.

The "Indian Firm" entered into a contract with the "Russian Firm" for the supply of construction machinery. In pursuance of that contract, the Indian Firm opened a confirmed, irrevocable and divisible letter of credit with the Bank of India, Limited for the entire value of the equipment. In the strength of the aforementioned contract, the Russian Firm supplied all the machinery it undertook to supply. They were duly taken possession of by the Indian Firm and put to work. The Indian Firm complained to the Russian Firm that the performance of the machinery supplied by it was not as efficient as represented at the time of entering into the contract and consequently it had incurred and continues to incur considerable loss. In pursuance of the agreement between the parties, the suit filed by the Indian Firm was withdrawn. In view of the "Gold Clause" the price fixed for the machinery supplied stood revised and consequently the Indian Firm had to pay to the Russian Firm an additional sum of about rupees twenty-six lacs. The Russian Firm appears to have drawn drafts on the Indian Firm for the excess amount payable under the gold clause. The settlement as contemplated by the Delhi agreement not having been reached, the Indian Firm filed the suit praying that the Bank of India as well as the Russian Firm should be restrained from taking any further steps in pursuance of the letter of credit opened by the Indian Firm in favour of the Russian Firm. Therein temporary injunctions were asked for in the very terms in which the permanent injunctions were prayed for. At a subsequent stage a further injunction restraining the Russian Firm from enforcing its right under the gold clause was also prayed for. The Russian Firm opposed those applications, but the trial Judge granted the temporary injunctions asked for.

Are the temporary injunctions issued by the trial judge sustainable?

Held, that ordinarily (this) Court does not interfere with interim orders. But herein legal principles of great importance affecting international trade are involved. An irrevocable letter of credit has a definite implication. It is a mechanism of great importance in international trade. Any interference with that mechanism is bound to have serious repercussions on the international trade of this country. Except under very exceptional circumstances, the Court should not interfere with that mechanism. Not only that. The letter of credit is independent of and unqualified by the contract of sale or underlying transaction. The autonomy of an irrevocable letter of credit is entitled to protection. As a rule Courts refrain from interfering with that autonomy. In the result, the temporary injunctions granted by the trial judge are set aside.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—These are connected appeals. They arise from Civil Suit No. 118 of 1967 on the original side of the High Court of Judicature at Madras. Herein the essential facts are few and simple though the question of law that arises for decision is of considerable importance.

The Suit has been brought by M/s. Tarapore & Co., Madras (hereinafter referred to as the "Indian Firm"). That firm had taken up on contract the work of excavation of canal as a part of the Farakka Barrage Project. In that connection they entered into a contract with M/s. V/O Tractores Export, Moscow (which will hereinafter be referred to as the "Russian Firm") for the supply of construction machinery such as Scrapers and Bulldozers. In pursuance of that contract, the Indian Firm opened a confirmed, irrevocable and devisible letter of credit with the Bank of India, Limited for the entire value of the equipment, i.e., Rs. 66,09,372 in favour of the Russian Firm negotiable through the Bank for Foreign Trade of the U.S.S.R., Moscow. Under the said letter of credit the Bank of India was required to pay to the Russian Firm on production of the documents particularised in the letter of credit alongwith the drafts. One of the conditions of the letter of credit was that 25 per cent. of the amount should be paid on the presentation of the specified documents and the balance of 75 per cent. to be paid one year from the date of the first payment. The agreement entered into between the Bank of India and the Russian Firm under the letter of credit was "subject to the Uniform Customs and Practice for Documentary Credits (1962 Revision), International Chamber of Commerce Brochure No. 222". Article 3 of the brochure says that :

"An irrevocable credit is a definite undertaking on the part of an issuing bank and constitutes the engagement of that bank to the beneficiary or, as the case may be, to the beneficiary and bona fide holders of drafts drawn and/or documents presented thereunder, that the provisions for payment, acceptance or negotiation contained in the credit will be duly fulfilled, provided that all the terms and conditions of the credit are complied with.

An irrevocable credit may be advised to a beneficiary through another bank without engagement on the part of that other bank (the advising bank), but when an issuing bank authorises another bank to confirm its irrevocable credit and the latter does so, such confirmation constitutes a definite undertaking on the part of the confirming bank either that the provisions for payment or acceptance will be duly fulfilled or, in the case of a credit available by negotiation of drafts, that the confirming bank will negotiate drafts without recourse to drawer.

Such undertakings can neither be modified nor cancelled without the agreement of all concerned."

Article 8 of the brochure says :

"In documentary credit operations all parties concerned deal in documents and not in goods.

Payment, acceptance or negotiation against documents which appear on their face to be in accordance with the terms and conditions of a credit by a bank authorised to do so, binds the party giving the authorisation to take up the documents and reimburse the bank which has effected the payment, acceptance or negotiation....."

The only other Article in that brochure which is relevant for our present purpose is Article 9 which reads :

"Banks assume no liability or responsibility for the form, sufficiency, accuracy, genuineness, falsification or legal effect of any documents, or for the general and/or particular conditions stipulated in the documents or superimposed thereon ; nor do they assume any liability or responsibility for the description, quantity, weight, quality, condition, packing, delivery, value or existence of the goods represented thereby, or for the good faith or acts and or omissions, solvency, performance or standing of the consignor, the carriers or the insurers of the goods or any other person whomsoever."

On the strength of the aforementioned contract, the Russian Firm supplied all the machinery it undertook to supply by about the end of December, 1960, which were duly taken possession of by the Indian Firm and put to work at Farakka Barrage Project. They are still in the possession of the Indian Firm. After the machinery was used for sometime, the Indian Firm complained to the Russian Firm that the performance of the machinery supplied by it was not as efficient as represented at the time of entering into the contract and consequently it had incurred and continues to incur considerable loss. In that connection there was some correspondence between the Indian Firm and the Russian Firm. Thereafter the Indian Firm instituted a suit on the original side of the High Court of Madras seeking an injunction restraining the Russian Firm from realizing the amount payable under the letter of credit. During the pendency of that suit the parties arrived at an agreement on 14th August, 1966 at Delhi (which shall be hereinafter referred to as the Delhi agreement). The portion of that agreement which is relevant for our present purpose reads as follows :

"Tarapore and Co., Madras, agree to withdraw immediately the Court case filed by them against "Tractoro export" Moscow, in the Madras High Court.

2. Immediately on Tarapore withdrawing the case, V/O "Tractoro export agree to instruct the Bank for Foreign Trade of the USSR in Moscow, not to demand any further payment against L.C. established by Tarapore and Co., Madras for a period of six months from the due dates in the first instances. During this period both the parties shall do their best to reach an amicable settlement.

3. In case the settlement between the two parties is not completed within this period of six months V/O Tractoro export shall further extend the period of payment by further period of six months for the settlement to be completed.

4. Tarapore and Co., shall authorise their Bank to keep the unpaid portions L.C. valid for the extended period as stated above."

At this stage it may be mentioned that the Russian Firm had received from the Bank of India 25 per cent of the money payable under the letter of credit very soon after it supplied to the Indian Firm the machinery mentioned earlier. In pursuance of the aforementioned agreement the Indian Firm withdrew the suit. Thereafter there were attempts to settle the dispute. In the meantime the Indian Rupee was devalued. The contract between the Indian Firm and the Russian Firm contains the following terms :

"Payment for the delivered goods shall be made by the Buyers in India Rupee in accordance with the Trade Agreement between the USSR and India dated 10th June, 1963. All the prices, are stated in Indian rupee. One Indian Rupee is equal to 0.186621 grammes of pure gold. If the above gold content of Indian Rupee is changed the prices and the amount of this Contract in Indian Rupee shall be revalued accordingly on the date of changing the gold parity of the Indian Rupee."

This clause will be hereinafter referred to as the 'Gold Clause'. In view of that clause, the price fixed for machinery supplied stood revised. Consequently under the contract the Indian Firm had to pay to the Russian Firm an additional sum of about rupees twenty-six lacs. Accordingly the bankers of the Russian Firm called upon the Indian Firm to open an additional letter of credit for payment of the extra price payable under the contract. They also intimated the Indian Firm that the extension of time for the payment of the price of the machinery supplied, agreed to at Delhi will be given effect to only after the Indian Firm arrange for the additional letter of credit asked for. The Indian Firm objected to this demand as per its letter of 20th September, 1966. The relevant portion of that letter reads :

"We are rather surprised to see this, because, by our arrangement dated the 14th August, 1966, at New Delhi you had agreed to give further time for the payments on the withdrawal of the Madras High Court case. That was the only condition that was talked about and incorporated in our written agreement. If you will be good enough to refer to the agreement dated the 14th August, 1966, you will find that we were obliged to withdraw the Madras suit pending talks of settlement and immediately on our withdrawing this suit, you agreed to instruct your Bankers not to demand any further payment under the letter of credit. There is absolutely no reference in that agreement to our having to open any additional letter of credit in view of the devaluation of the Indian rupee..... We would therefore request you to immediately instruct your Bankers in Moscow to advise our Bankers regarding the extension of time for payment under the letter of credit without any reference to any additional letters of credit in view of devaluation..... Moreover, when the entire question is open for amicable settlement between us, it is not possible to determine what exactly will be amount payable and unless that amount is known, it is not possible to open additional letters of credit to give effect to the gold clause....."

On 1st November, 1966, the Russian Firm sent to the Indian Firm addendum No. 1 modifying the original contract in accordance with the gold clause. The last clause of that addendum recited that "all other terms and conditions are as stated in the above mentioned contract" (original contract). The Indian Firm objected to that addendum as well as to the demand for opening an additional letter of credit. In that connection the Russian Firm wrote a letter to the Indian Firm on 29th November, 1966. As considerable arguments were advanced on the basis of that letter we shall quote the relevant portion of that letter :

".....We confirm that you have signed with us the addendum No. 1 to our Contract No. 61/Tarapore—220/65 dated the 2nd February, 1965, at our request for the sole and specific purpose of satisfying our bankers. We confirm further that this addendum will not in any manner prejudice the arrangement we have come to in Delhi on the 14th August, 1966, and is without prejudice to your claims and points of controversy regarding which we shall have further discussions with a view to reach an amicable settlement.

Under this addendum, the company will extend the letter of credit for one year and accept the drafts for the difference in value of 57.5 per cent due to devaluation. The final amount payable will be in accordance with the settlement."

Thereafter the Russian Firm appears to have drawn drafts on the Indian firm for the excess amount payable under the gold clause. For one reason or the other, no settlement as contemplated by the Delhi agreement was reached. The Indian firm complained that the Russian Firm never made any serious attempt to resolve the dispute whereas the Russian Firm alleged that it found no substance in the complaint made by the Indian Firm as regards the machinery supplied. In the suit as brought, as well as in these appeals that controversy is not open for examination. Suffice it to say that the parties did not amicably settle the dispute in question. When the extended time granted under the Delhi agreement was about to come to a close, the Indian Firm instituted the suit from which these appeals have arisen. In that suit the only substantive relief asked for is that the Bank of India as well as the Russian Firm should be restrained from taking any further steps in pursuance of the letter of credit opened by the Indian Firm in favour of the Russian Firm. Therein temporary injunctions were asked for in the very terms in which the permanent injunctions were prayed for. At a subsequent stage a further injunction restraining the Russian Firm from enforcing its right under the gold clause was also prayed for. The Russian Firm opposed those applications but the trial Judge granted the temporary injunctions asked for. The Russian Firm took up the matter in appeal to the Appellate Bench of that High Court which reversed the order of the trial Judge by its Order dated 9th October, 1968, but it certified that they are fit cases for a appeal to this Court. When the applications in the appeals seeking interim orders came up for consideration by this Court the Russian Firm entered its caveat. It not only opposed the interim reliefs prayed for, it further challenged the validity of the certificate granted by the High Court on the ground that the orders appealed against are not 'final orders' within the meaning of Article 133 of the Constitution. Evidently as a matter of abundant caution, the Indian Firm had filed two separate applications seeking Special Leave to appeal against the orders of the Appellate Bench of the Madras High Court. After hearing the parties this Court revoked the certificates granted holding that the orders appealed against are not 'final orders' but at the same time granted Special Leave to the Indian Firm to appeal against the orders of the Madras High Court. Civil Appeals Nos. 2051 and 2052 of 1968 are appeals filed by the Indian Firm.

Before the Appellate Bench of the High Court of Madras, the Indian Firm had objected to the maintainability of the appeals filed by the Russian Firm on the ground that orders appealed against are not judgments within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent of the Madras High Court but that objection had been overruled by the Appellate Bench following the earlier decisions of that High Court. That contention was again raised in the appeals filed by the Indian Firm in this Court. To obviate any difficulty the Russian Firm applied to this Court for Special Leave to appeal against the interim orders passed by the trial judge. We allowed those applications and consequently Civil Appeals Nos. 2305 and 2306 of 1968 came to be filed.

In view of the appeals filed by the Russian Firm in this Court against the interim orders made by the trial judge it is not necessary to decide whether the appeals filed by the Russian Firm before the Appellate Bench of the Madras High Court were maintainable? On that question, judicial opinion is sharply divided as could be seen from the decision of this Court in *Asrumati Debi v. Kumar Rupendra Deb, Rajkot and others*¹. Hence we shall confine our attention to the question whether the temporary injunctions issued by the trial judge are sustainable?

The scope of an irrevocable letter of credit is explained thus in Halsbury's Laws of England (Volume 34) paragraph 319 at page 185) :

"It is often made a condition of a mercantile contract that the buyer shall pay for the goods by means of a confirmed credit, and it is then the duty of the buyer to procure his bank, known as the issuing or originating bank, to issue an irrevocable credit in favour of the seller by which the bank undertakes to the seller, either directly or through another bank in the seller's country known as the correspondent or negotiating bank, to accept drafts drawn upon it for the price of the goods, against tender by the seller of the shipping documents. The contractual relationship between the issuing bank and the buyer is defined by the terms of the agreement between them under which the letter opening the credit is issued; and as between the seller and the bank, the issue of the credit duly notified to the seller creates a new contractual nexus and renders the bank directly liable to the seller to pay the purchase price or to accept the bill of exchange upon tender of the documents. The contract thus created between the seller and the bank is separate from, although ancillary to, the original contract between the buyer and the seller, by reason of the bank's undertaking to the seller, which is absolute. Thus the bank is not entitled to rely upon terms of the contract between the buyer and the seller which might permit the buyer to reject the goods and to refuse payment therefore; and, conversely, the buyer is not entitled to an injunction restraining the seller from dealing with the letter of credit if the goods are defective."

Chalmers on "Bills of Exchange" explains the legal position in these words :

"The modern commercial credit serves to interpose between a buyer and seller a third person of un questioned solvency, almost invariably a banker of international repute; the banker on the instructions of the buyer issues the letter of credit and thereby undertakes to act as paymaster upon the seller performing the conditions set out in it. A letter of credit may be in any one of a number of specialised forms and contains the undertaking of the banker to honour all bills of exchange drawn thereunder. It can hardly be over-emphasised that the banker is not bound or entitled to honour such bills of exchange unless they, and such accompanying documents as may be required thereunder, are in exact compliance with the terms of the credit. Such documents must be scrutinised with meticulous care, the maxim de minimis non curat lex cannot be invoked where payment is made by the letter of credit. If the seller has complied with the terms of the letter of credit, however, there is an absolute obligation upon the banker to pay irrespective of any disputes there may be between the buyer and the seller as to whether the goods are up to contract or not."

Similar are the views expressed in 'Practice and Law of Banking' by H.B. Sheldon "the Law of Banker's Commercial Credits" by H.C. Gutteridge "the Law Relating to Commercial Letters of Credit" by A.G. Davis "the Law Relating to Bankers' Letters of Credit" by B.C. Mitra and in several other text books read to us by Mr. Mohan Kumaramangalam, learned Counsel for the Russian Firm. The legal position as set out above was not controverted by Mr. M.C. Setalvad, learned Counsel for the Indian Firm. So far as the Bank of India is concerned it admitted its liability to honour the letter of credit and expressed its willingness to abide by its terms. It took the same position before the High Court.

The main grievance of the Indian Firm is that if the Russian Firm is allowed to take away the money secured to it by the letter of credit, it cannot effectively enforce its claim arising from the breach of the contract it complains of. It was urged on its behalf that the Russian Firm has no assets in this country and therefore and decree that it may be able to obtain cannot be executed. Therefore, it was contended that the trial Court was justified in issuing the impugned orders. The allegation that Russian Firm has no assets in this country was not made in the pleadings. That apart in the circumstances of this case that allegation has no relevance. An irrevocable letter of credit has a definite implication. It is a mechanism of great importance in international trade. Any interference with that mechanism is bound to have serious repercussions on the international trade of this country. Except under very exceptional circumstances, the Courts should not interfere with that mechanism.

For our present purpose we shall assume without deciding that the allegations made by the Indian Firm are true. We shall further assume that the suit as brought is maintainable though Mr. Kumaramangalam seriously challenged its maintainability. But yet, in our judgment, the learned trial judge was not justified in law in granting the temporary injunctions appealed against. Ordinarily this Court does not interfere with interim orders. But herein legal principles of great importance affecting international trade are involved. If the orders impugned are allowed to stand they are bound to have their repercussion on our international trade.

We have earlier referred to several well known treaties on the subject. Now we shall proceed to consider the decided cases bearing on the question under consideration.

A case somewhat similar to the one before us came up for consideration before the Queens Bench Division in England in *Hamzeh Walas and Sons v. British Imex Industries Ltd.*¹. Therein the plaintiffs, a Jordanian firm contracted to purchase from the defendants, a British firm a large quantity of reinforced steel rods, to be delivered in two instalments. Payment was to be effected by opening in favour of the defendants of two confirmed letters of credit with the Midland Bank Ltd., in London, one in respect of each instalment. The letters of credit were duly opened and the first was realized by the defendants on the delivery of the first instalment. The plaintiffs complained that that instalment was defective and sought an injunction to bar the defendants from realizing the second letter of credit. Donovan, J., the trial judge refused the application. In appeal Jenkins, Sellers and Pearce L.JJ., confirmed the decision of the trial judge. In the course of his judgment Jenkins L.J., who spoke for the Court observed thus :

“We have been referred to a number of authorities, and it seems to be plain enough that the opening of a confirmed letter of credit constitutes a bargain between the banker and the vender of the goods, which imposes upon the banker an absolute obligation to pay, irrespective of any dispute there may be between the parties as to whether the goods are up to contract or not. An elaborate commercial system has been built up on the footing that bankers' confirmed credits are of that character, and, in my judgment, it would be wrong for this Court in the present case to interfere with that established practice.

There is this to be remembered, too. A vender of goods selling against a confirmed letter of credit is selling under the assurance that nothing will prevent him from receiving the price. That is of no mean advantage when goods manufactured in one country are being sold in another. It is, further more, to be observed that vendors are often reselling goods bought from third parties. When they are doing that, and when they are being paid by a confirmed letter of credit, their practice is—and I think it was followed by the defendants in this case—to finance the payments necessary to be made to their suppliers against the letter of credit. That system of financing these operations, as I see it, would break down completely if a dispute as between the vendor and the purchaser was to have the effect of "freezing," if I may use that expression, the sum in respect of which the letter of credit was opened."

In *Urquhart Lindsay and Co. Ltd. v. Eastern Bank Ltd.*¹, the King's Bench held that the refusal of the defendants bank to take and pay for the particular bills on presentation of the proper documents constituted a repudiation of the contract as a whole and that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages arising from such a breach. It may be noted that in that case the price quoted in the invoices was objected to by the buyer and he had notified his objection to the bank. But under the terms of the letter of credit the bank was required to make payments on the basis of the invoices tendered by the seller. The Court held that if the buyers had an enforceable claim that adjustment must be made by way of refund by the seller and not by the way of retention by the buyer.

Similar opinions have been expressed by the American Courts. The leading American case on the subject is *Dulien Steel Products Inc., of Washington v. Bankers Trust Co.*². The facts of that case were as follows :

The plaintiffs, Dulien Steel Products Inc., of Washington, contracted to sell steel scrap to the European Iron and Steel Community. The transaction was put through M/s. Marco Polo Group Project, Ltd., who were entitled to commission for arranging the transaction. For the payment of the commission to Marco Polo, plaintiffs procured an irrevocable letter of credit from Seattle First National Bank. As desired by Marco Polo this letter of credit was opened in favour of one Sica. The defendant-bankers confirmed that letter of credit. The credit stipulated for payment against (1) a receipt of Sica for the amount of the credit and (2) a notification of Seattle Bank to the defendants that the plaintiffs had negotiated documents evidencing the shipment of the goods. Sica tendered the stipulated receipt and a Seattle Bank informed the defendants that the Dulien had negotiated documentary drafts. Meanwhile after further negotiations between the plaintiffs and the vendees the price of the goods sold was reduced and consequently the commission payable to Marco Polo stood reduced but the defendant were not informed of this fact. Only after notifying the defendants about the negotiation of the drafts drawn under the contract of sale, the Seattle Bank informed the defendants about the changes underlying the transaction and asked them not to pay Sica the full amount of the credit. The defendants were also informed that Sica was merely a nominee of Marco Polo and has no rights of his own to the sum credit. Sica, however, claimed payment of the full amount of the credit. The defendants asked further instructions from Seattle Bank but despite Seattle Banks instructions decided to comply with Sica's request. After informing Seattle Bank of their intention, they paid Sica the full amount of the credit. Plaintiffs thereupon brought an action in the District Court of New York for the recovery of the moneys paid to Sica. The action was dismissed by the trial Court and that decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. That decision establishes the well known principle that the letter of credit is independent of and unqualified by the contract of sale or underlying transaction. The autonomy of an irrevocable letter of credit is entitled to protection. As a rule Courts refrain from interfering with that autonomy.

A half hearted attempt was made on behalf of the India Firm to persuade us not to apply the principles noticed above as in these appeals we are dealing with a complaint of fraud. The facts pleaded in the plaint do not amount to a plea of fraud despite the assertions of the Indian Firm that the Russian Firm was guilty of fraud.

Evidently with a view to steer clear of the well established legal position Mr. Setalvad, learned Counsel for the Indian Firm urged that the letter of credit was no more enforceable as the original contract stood modified as a result of the Delhi agreement and the subsequent correspondence between the parties. It was urged that according to the modified contract the Indian Firm is only liable to pay the price that may be settled between the buyer and the seller. This contention has not been taken either in the plaint or in the arguments before the trial judge or before the Appellate Bench. It is taken for the first time in this Court. This is not purely a legal contention. The contention in question bears on the intention of the parties who entered into the agreement. No one could have known the intention better than plaintiff who was a party to the contract. If there was such an intention, the plaintiff would have certainly pleaded the same. That apart, we are unable to accept the contention that either the Delhi agreement or the subsequent correspondence between the parties modified the original contract. The Delhi agreement merely provided that the parties will try and settle the dispute out of Court, if possible. Much was made of the letter written by the Russian Firm to the Indian Firm on 29th November, 1966, wherein as seen earlier it was stated :

“that the final amount payable will be in accordance with the settlement.”. This letter has to be read along with the other letters that passed between the parties. If so read, it is clear that the statement that the final payment will be made in accordance with the settlement is subject to the condition that the parties are able to arrive at a settlement. Otherwise the parties continue to be bound by the original contract subject to the extension of the time granted under the Delhi agreement for the payment of the price. As regards the additional payment demanded by the Russian Firm, there is no occasion for issuing any temporary injunction. If the Indian Firm does not comply with that demand the law will take its course. It is for that Firm to choose its course of action.

In the result we allow Civil Appeals Nos. 2305 and 2306 of 1968 with the costs of the appellant therein and set aside the temporary injunctions granted by the trial judge. The other appeals are dismissed with no order as to costs. The costs to be paid by the the Indian company.

Interpretation of Statutes—Act, a temporary measure remaining in the statute book for over 20 years—No guidelines to regulate the exercise of the powers of the District Magistrate—Commissioner to exercise his discretion in preference to the discretion exercised by the District Magistrate—State Government to exercise its powers in any way it pleases—Construction of the provisions according to the rules of construction of statutes resulting in anomalies—Court, if can fall back on the grammatical construction—U.P. (Temporary) Control of Rent and Eviction Act, 1947.

U.P. (Temporary) Control of Rent and Eviction Act, (III of 1947), sections 3 and 7 (f)—Interpretation—Landlord and tenant—Landlord desiring to evict his tenant on grounds other than (a) to (g) of section 3 (1) to obtain permission of the District Magistrate for instituting the suit—Order of the Commissioner on revision given finally subject to the order by the State Government—Landlord filing the suit after obtaining permission from the Commissioner, but State Government revoking the permission—Suit validly instituted, if ceases to be maintainable.

Section 3 of the U.P. (Temporary) Control of Rent and Eviction Act, 1947, inter alia provided that subject to any order passed under sub-section (3), no suit shall without the permission of the District Magistrate be filed in any civil Court against a tenant for his eviction from any accommodation, except on one or more of the grounds (a) to (g).

Though it was intended to be a temporary measure when it was originally enacted, it has now remained in the statute book for over 20 years and there is no knowing how long the same will continue to be in force. Therefore it is but appropriate that the provisions of this Act should be clear and unambiguous. From sub-section (1) of section 3 it is not possible to find out the contents of the powers of the District Magistrate. No guidelines are laid down therein to regulate the exercise of the powers of the District Magistrate. It is not possible to find out from that provision under what circumstances the District Magistrate can grant the permission asked for and under what circumstances he can refuse the same. It is likely that different District Magistrates are exercising that power in different ways. One consideration may appeal to one District Magistrate and a totally different consideration may influence another District Magistrate. It would have been appropriate if the Legislature had defined the scope of the powers of the District Magistrate or at least laid down certain guide-lines for regulating his discretion. Sub-section (3) of section 3 says that if the Commissioner is not satisfied as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the order passed by the District Magistrate, he may alter or reverse the order of the District Magistrate or make such other order as may be just and proper. It is not possible to find out on what basis the Commissioner can determine the correctness, legality or propriety of the order made by the District Magistrate. As no restrictions are placed on the powers of the District Magistrate in granting or refusing to grant the permission asked for under section 3 (1). Therefore the only thing the Commissioner can do is to exercise his discretion in preference to the discretion exercised by the District Magistrate. Now coming to the power conferred on the State Government under section 7 (f), it would be seen that it is a power of wide amplitude. It can be exercised by it in any way it pleases. No restriction either as to the time within which it can be exercised is placed on the State Government. Under these circumstances anomalies are inevitable. Therefore, in construing this Act, no useful purpose will be served by taking into consideration the hardship to the parties. In whatever way we may construe sections 3 and 7 (f) hardship to one party or the other is inevitable. Therefore we have to fall back on the grammatical construction of sub-section (1) of section 3 and leave out of consideration all other rules of construction for finding out the intention of the legislature.

Section 3 (1) does not restrict the landlord's right to evict his tenant on any of the grounds mentioned in clauses (a) to (g) of that sub-section. But if he wants to sue his tenant for eviction on any ground other than those mentioned in those clauses then he has to obtain the permission of the District Magistrate whose discretion is subject to any order passed under sub-section (3) of section 3 by the Commissioner. These are the only restrictions placed on the power of a landlord to institute a suit for eviction of his tenant. If a landlord files a suit for the eviction of his tenant without obtaining the permission of the District Magistrate that suit is not maintainable but if he files a suit after obtaining the permission of the District Magistrate and if the Commissioner revokes the permission granted by the District Magistrate in a properly instituted application under section 3 (2) then the suit instituted by him will be considered as having been filed without the permission of the District Magistrate because section 3 (1) in specific terms says that the permission given by the District Magistrate is subject to any order passed under sub-section (3). In other words the permission given by the District Magistrate does not acquire any finality until either the period fixed for filing an application under sub-section (2) of section 3 expires and no application under that section was filed within that time or if an application had been filed within that time, the same had been disposed of by the Commissioner. The permission to file a suit for eviction assumes finality under section 3 (1) once the Commissioner decides the revision petition pending before him. In fact sub-section (4) of section 3 says that the order of the Commissioner is final. It is true that that order despite the fact that it is final is subject to any order passed by the State Government under section 7 (f). There is no provision in the Act providing that a suit validly instituted after getting the required permission under section 3 (1) ceases to be maintainable because of any order made by the State Government under section 7 (f). Similarly there is no provision in the Act invalidating a decree passed after the Act came into force in a validly instituted suit. A decree of a Court in a suit validly instituted is binding on the parties to the same. It is true that the finality or the force of a decree can be taken away by a statute, but the Court will not readily infer that a decree passed by a competent Court has become unenforceable unless it is shown that a provision of law has specifically or by necessary implication made that decree unenforceable. On an examination of the relevant provisions of the Act the conclusion is that when the Commissioner sets aside the order passed by the District Magistrate granting permission to file a suit for ejecting a tenant, the order of the Commissioner prevails. If the Commissioner cancels the permission granted by the District Magistrate there is no effective permission left and the suit instituted by the plaintiff without awaiting his decision must be treated as one filed without any valid permission by the District Magistrate. But a suit validly instituted after obtaining a permission as required by section 3 (1) does not cease to be maintainable even if the State Government revokes after the institution of the suit, the permission granted. If the State Government revokes the permission granted before the institution of the suit then there would be no valid permission to sue. In other words the State Government's power to revoke the permission granted under section 3 (1) gets exhausted once the suit is validly instituted.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and decree dated the 19th March, 1968 of the Allahabad High Court in Second Appeal No. 2296 of 1961.

J.P. Goyal and A.C. Ratnaparkhi, for Appellant.

G.B. Agarwala, Senior Advocate (R. Mahalingier, Advocate, with him), for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—The question of law that arises for decision in this appeal by Special Leave is not free from difficulty. That question is, whether a decree for eviction obtained in a suit instituted after obtaining the permission of the Commissioner under sub-section (3) of section 3 of the U.P. (Temporary) Control of Rent and Eviction Act, 1947 (to be hereinafter referred to as the Act) becomes unenforceable if the State Government acting under section 7 (f) of that Act revokes the permission granted by the Commissioner after the decree is passed?

The appellant was a tenant of the respondent in respect of a shop in Baluganji in Agra. On 2nd January, 1959, the respondent applied to the District Magistrate under section 3 (1) of the Act for permission to institute a suit against the appellant for evicting him from the shop in question. That application was rejected by the District Magistrate as per his order of 9th July, 1959. The respondent took up the matter in revision to the Commissioner under sub-section (2) of section 3. The Commissioner reversed the order of the District Magistrate and granted the permission asked for on 16th October, 1959. As against that order the appellant moved the State Government under section 7 (F) on 17th November, 1959. On 1st January, 1960, the respondent served on the appellant a notice under section 106 of the Transfer of Property Act. The appellant replied to that notice on 6th January, 1960. In that reply he informed the respondent that he had already moved the State Government to revoke the permission granted by the Commissioner. On 13th February, 1960 the respondent instituted suit No. 115 of 1960 in the Court of Munsiff, Agra seeking for the eviction of the appellant from the suit premises. The appellant filed his written statement in that case on 7th May, 1960. Therein again he took the plea that the permission granted by the Commissioner is not final as he had moved the Government to revoke the same. The suit was decreed by the learned munsif on 2nd November, 1960. The appellant went up in appeal as against that order to the civil Judge, Agra. On 27th January, 1961, the State Government revoked the permission granted by the Commissioner during the pendency of the appeal. Relying on this order the Civil Judge of Agra allowed the appeal of the appellant on 9th February, 1961. As against that decision the respondent went up in second appeal to the High Court. The High Court allowed the second appeal on 19th March, 1968 following the Full Bench decision of that Court in Bashi Ram v. Mantri Lal.¹ This appeal is directed against that decision.

The Act was intended as a temporary measure as could be gathered from its title as well as the preamble. It is deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of October, 1946 though it was passed in 1947. Under the Act as originally stood, the decision of the District Magistrate under section 3 was neither appealable nor revisable. As per the amendments effected in 1952 a limited power of revision was conferred on the Commissioner. By the Amending Act XVII of 1954, the power conferred on the Commissioner was enlarged and section 7 (F) was incorporated in the Act which says that :

“ the State Government may call for the records of any case granting or refusing to grant permission for the filing of a suit for eviction referred to in section 3.....and make such order as appears to it necessary for the ends of justice.”

The only sections in the Act Material for the purpose of this appeal are sections 3 and 7 (F). Section 3 reads thus :

“ Restrictions on evictions.—Subject to any order passed under sub-section (3), no suit shall without the permission of the District Magistrate, be filed in any civil Court against a tenant for his eviction from any accommodation, except on one or more of the following grounds :

(a) that the tenant is in arrears of rent for more than three months and has failed to pay the same to the landlord within one month of the service upon him of a notice of demand ;

(b) that the tenant has wilfully caused or permitted to be caused substantial damage to the accommodation ;

(c) that the tenant has, without the permission in writing of the landlord made or permitted to be made any such construction as, in the opinion of the Court, has materially altered the accommodation or is likely substantially to diminish its value ;

(d) that the tenant has created a nuisance or has done any act which is inconsistent with the purpose for which he was admitted to the tenancy of the accommodation, or which is likely to affect adversely and substantially the landlord's interest therein ;

(e) that the tenant has on or after the 1st day of October, 1946, sub-let the whole or any portion of the accommodation without the permission of the landlord ;

(f) that the tenant has renounced his character as such or denied the title of the landlord and the latter has not waived his right or condoned the conduct of the tenant ;

(g) that the tenant was allowed to occupy the accommodation as a part of his contract of employment under the landlord and his employment has been determined.

Explanation.—For the purposes of sub-section (e) lodging a person in a hotel or a lodging-house shall not be deemed to be sub-letting.

(2) Where any application has been made to the District Magistrate for permission to sue a tenant for eviction from any accommodation and the District Magistrate grants or refuses the permission, the party aggrieved by his order may within 30 days from the date on which the order is communicated to him, apply to the Commissioner to revise the order.

(3) The Commissioner shall hear the application made under sub-section (2), as far as may be, within six weeks from the date of making it, and he may, if he is not satisfied as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the order passed by the District Magistrate or as to the regularity of proceedings held before him, alter or revise his order, or make such other order as may be just and proper.

(4) The order of the Commissioner under sub-section (3) shall, subject to any order passed by the State Government under section 7 (F) be final.

We have earlier quoted the relevant portion of section 7 (F).

Conflicting opinions were expressed by different Benches of the Allahabad High Court as to the scope of section 3, till the decision of the Full Bench in *Bashi Ram's case*¹. The Full Bench held that a decree obtained in a suit for eviction instituted after obtaining the requisite permission will not become unenforceable even if the State Government revoked, after the decree is passed, the permission granted, in exercise of its powers under section 7(F). Majority of the Judges in that case further held that once a suit is instituted after obtaining the permission of the District Magistrate, any further order made either by the Commissioner or the State Government cannot effect the course of that suit or the decree passed therein. Dwivedi, J., the other Judge did not express any opinion on that question but even according to him in the appeal filed against the decree, the appellate Court cannot receive in evidence the order made by the State Government which means that the decree cannot be reversed on the ground that the State Government had revoked the permission granted. The correctness of the Full Bench decision is challenged by the appellant in this appeal. In support of his interpretation of sections 3 and 7(F) he placed reliance on the decision of a Division Bench of the High Court of Allahabad in *Dr. S. L. Khoparji v. State Government*². He also sought support from the decision of a Single Judge of that Court in *Basant Lal Sah v. Bhagwan Prasad Sah*³. It is not necessary to refer to that various decisions of the Allahabad High Court on this question. Suffice it to say the in that Court there was serious cleavage of opinion on the question that we are considering in this appeal till the decision of the Full Bench in *Bashi Ram's case*¹. We were given to understand that Dhavan, J., had doubted the correctness of the decision of the Full Bench and had requested the Chief Justice to constitute a larger Bench to consider the correctness of the decision in *Bashi Ram's case*¹ but in view of the pendency of this appeal, the constitution of a larger bench was not considered necessary.

The contention of Mr. Goyal, the learned Counsel for the appellant was that the Act generally speaking, has restricted the right of the landlord to evict his tenant, to one or other of the grounds mentioned in clauses (a) to (g) of section 3 (1); but in order to meet any exceptional case, it is provided in section 3 (1) that a suit for eviction may be instituted on any ground other than those mentioned in clauses (a) to (g) if the permission of the District Magistrate is obtained; the order made by the District Magistrate is revisable both by the Commissioner as well as the State Government; the only order that is final is that made by the State Government. If a landlord chooses to institute a suit on the basis of the permission granted by the District Magistrate or the Commissioner without waiting for the decision of the State Government he takes the risk; if the State Government revokes the permission granted by the District Magistrate or the Commissioner then the suit must be deemed to have been instituted without permission and consequently not maintainable. Mr. Goyal urged that if the decision in *Bashi Ram's case*¹, is accepted as correct then so far as the tenant is concerned, generally speaking, he cannot invoke the powers of the State Government under section 7 (F) because immediately after the decision of the Commissioner, if the same is in his favour, the landlord is likely to institute a suit for eviction and thus nullify the power of the State Government under section 7 (F). He urged that as section 7 (F) empowers the State Government to revise the order made by the subordinate authorities whether the same is in favour of the landlord or the tenant we should not place an interpretation on section 3 which would affect the power of the State Government to do justice to the tenants for whose benefit the Act has been enacted.

1. I.L.R. (1965) 1 All. 545.
2. (1958) A.L.J. 724.

3. A.I.R. 1964 All. 210.

On the other hand it was urged by Mr. C.B. Aggarwal, learned Counsel for the respondent that the landlord has a right to sue for the eviction of his tenant under the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act subject to the restrictions stipulated therein. That is a statutory right. The provisions contained in the Act to the extent the encroach upon the rights of the landlord either specifically or by necessary implication for the control the rights of the landlord. In other respects the landlord's rights under the Transfer of Property Act remain unaffected. According to him the only restriction placed on the landlord in the matter of instituting a suit for evictions on grounds other than those mentioned in clauses (a) to (g) in section 3 (1) is to obtain the prior permission of the District Magistrate subject to the order made under sub-section (3) of section 3 by the Commissioner; once a suit is validly instituted in accordance with those provisions, no order of the State Government can either interfere with the course of that suit or invalidate the decree obtained therein. He urged that if the position is as contended by the learned Counsel for the appellant, curious results are likely to follow. Section 7 (F) does not fix any period within which the State Government must act. It can exercise its power under that provision at any time it pleases—may be after 10 years or 20 years; the power conferred on the State Government is extremely wide as observed by this Court in *Shri Bhagwan and another v. Ram Chand and another*¹. Therefore it can revoke the permission granted after the decree for eviction is confirmed by the High Court or even the Supreme Court and thus make a mockery of the judicial process; this could not have been the intention of the Legislature. According to Mr. Aggarwal from the very scheme of the Act and from the very nature of the power conferred on the State Government, it cannot be exercised after a suit is instituted after complying with the requirements of sub-section (1) of section 3. His further contention was that on a proper construction of sub-section (1) of section 3, it would be seen that the suit instituted after obtaining the required permission being a validly instituted suit, its progress cannot be interrupted; the permission required under section 3 (1) is the permission of the District Magistrate subject to any order under section 3 (3) by the Commissioner; in other words the permission given by the District Magistrate is not final till affirmed by the Commissioner; till then it remains tentative; once the Commissioner affirms the same or grants the permission asked for it becomes final and thus amounts to a valid permission to sue; hence a suit filed on the basis of that permission is a validly instituted suit unless the permission granted was revoked by the State Government before the institution of the suit. Proceeding further he stated that it is true that the order of the Commissioner though final yet it is subject to any order that may be passed by the State Government; but section 3 (1), the provision dealing with the permission to file a suit for eviction does not refer to the order under section 7 (F); it only speaks of the permission granted by the District Magistrate subject to the order of the Commissioner and not further subject to any orders made by the State Government. In this connection he invited our attention to the fact that as against the order passed by the District Magistrate under sub-section (1) of section 3 a revision petition can be filed before the Commissioner within 30 days of that order and not thereafter. The Commissioner has not even the power to condone the delay in filing the revision petition. Further under sub-section (3) of section 3, the Commissioner is required to hear the application made under sub-section (2) of section 3, as far as may be, within six weeks from the date of making it. All these provisions indicate that the legislature was of the opinion that the proceedings under section 3 should be carried on expeditiously and the decision of the Commissioner should be considered as final. According to Mr. Aggarwal, the question of granting or refusing to grant the permission under section 3 are primarily to be dealt with only by the District Magistrate and the Commissioner. They are the only tribunals in the hierarchy of the tribunals constituted for that purpose. The power given to the Government under section 7 (F) is merely a supervisory power. That is why no limitation is imposed on the exercise of that power either in the matter of time within which it should be exercised or the circumstances under which it can be exercised. Such a power according to him is a reserve power and therefore has to be exercised before the Court's jurisdiction is invoked. He particularly laid emphasis on the fact that sub-section (1) of section 3, the compliance of which is necessary before validly instituting the suit does not at all refer to an order under section 7 (F).

After examining the provisions of this Act, we are constrained to observe that the drafting of this Act leaves considerable room for improvement despite the fact that it was amended twice over. Though it was intended to be a temporary measure when it was originally enacted, it has now remained in the statute book for over 20 years and there is no knowing how long the same will continue to be in force. Therefore it is but appropriate that the provisions of this Act should be clear and unambiguous. From sub-section (1) of section 3 it is not possible to find out the contents of the powers of the District Magistrate. No guidelines are laid down therein to regulate the exercise of the powers of the District Magistrate. It is not possible to find out from that provision under what circumstances the District Magistrate can grant the permission asked for and under what circumstances he can refuse the same. It is likely that different District Magistrates are exercising that power in different ways. One consideration may appeal to one District Magistrate and a totally different consideration may influence another District Magistrate. It would have been appropriate if the legislature had defined the scope of the powers of the District Magistrate or at least laid down certain guide-lines for regulating his discretion. Sub-section (3) of section 3 says that if the Commissioner is not satisfied as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the order passed by the District Magistrate, he may alter or reverse the order of the District Magistrate or make such other order as may be just and proper. It is not possible to find out on what basis the Commissioner can determine the correctness, legality or propriety of the order made by the District Magistrate. As seen earlier, no restrictions are placed on the powers of the District Magistrate in granting or refusing to grant the permission asked for under section 3 (1). Therefore the only thing the Commissioner can do is to exercise his discretion in preference to the discretion exercised by the District Magistrate. Now coming to the power conferred on the State Government under section 7 (F), it would be seen that it is a power of wide amplitude. It can be exercised by it in any way it pleases. No restriction either as to the time within which it can be exercised or as to the circumstances under which it can be exercised is placed on the State Government. Under these circumstances the anomalies pointed out by Mr. Goyal as well as by Mr. Aggarwal are inevitable. Therefore in construing this Act, no useful purpose will be served by taking into consideration the hardship to the parties. In whatever way we may construe sections 3 and 7 (F), hardship to one party or the other is inevitable. Neither Counsel suggested to us any interpretation which could steer clear of the anomalies pointed out at the Bar. Therefore we have to fall back on the grammatical construction of sub-section (1) of section 3 and leave out of consideration all other rules of construction for finding out the intention of the legislature. Section 3 (1) does not restrict the landlord's right to evict his tenant on any of the grounds mentioned in clauses (a) to (g) of that sub-section. But if he wants to sue his tenant for eviction on any ground other than those mentioned in those clauses then he has to obtain the permission of the District Magistrate whose discretion is subject to any order passed under sub-section (3) of section 3 by the Commissioner. These are the only restrictions placed on the power of a landlord to institute a suit for eviction of his tenant. If a landlord files a suit for the eviction of his tenant without obtaining the permission of the District Magistrate that suit is not maintainable but if he files a suit after obtaining the permission of the District Magistrate and if the Commissioner revokes the permission granted by the District Magistrate in a properly instituted application under section 3 (2) then the suit instituted by him will be considered as having been filed without the permission of the District Magistrate because section 3 (1) in specific terms says that the permission given by the District Magistrate is subject to any order passed under sub-section (3). In other words the permission given by the District Magistrate does not acquire any finality until either the period fixed for filing an application under sub-section (2) of section 3 expires and no application under that section was filed within that time or if an application had been filed within that time, the same had been disposed of by the Commissioner. The permission to file a suit for eviction assumes finality under section 3 (1) once the Commissioner decides the revision petition pending before him. In fact sub-section (4) of section 3 says that the order of the Commissioner is final. It is true that that order despite the fact that it is final is subject to any order passed by the State Government under section 7 (F). There is no provision in the Act providing that a suit validly instituted after getting the required permission under section 3 (1) ceases to be maintainable because of any order made by the State Government under section 7 (F). Similarly there is no provision in the Act invalidating a decree passed after the Act came into force in a validly instituted suit. Section 14 provides :—

“no decree for the eviction of a tenant from any accommodation passed before the date of commencement of this Act shall, in so far as it relates to the eviction of such tenant, be executed against him as long as this Act remains in force except on any of the grounds mentioned in section 3 :

Provided that the tenant agrees to pay to the landlord “reasonable annual rent” or the rent payable by him before the passing of the decree whichever is higher.”

This provision applies only to decrees passed before the date of the commencement of the Act. A decree of a Court in a suit validly instituted is binding on the parties to the same. It is true that the finality or the force of a decree can be taken away by a statute, but the Court will not readily infer that a decree passed by a competent Court has become unenforceable unless it is shown that a provision of law has specifically or by necessary implication made that decree unenforceable. No such provision was brought to our notice. On an examination of the relevant provisions of the Act our conclusion is that when the Commissioner sets aside the order passed by the District Magistrate granting permission to file a suit for ejecting a tenant, the order of the Commissioner prevails. If he cancels the permission granted by the District Magistrate there is no effective permission left and the suit instituted by the plaintiff without awaiting his decision must be treated as one filed without any valid permission by the District Magistrate. To this extent we are in agreement with the decision of Upadhaya, J., in *Munsi Lal and another v. Shambhu Nath Ram Kishan*¹. From this it follows that the Full Bench decision in *Bashi Ram's case*², to the extent it held that a suit filed by the land'ord after obtaining the permission of the District Magistrate cannot become infructuous even if the Commissioner revokes the permission, is incorrect. But we agree with the Full Bench that a suit validly instituted after obtaining a permission as required by section 3 (1) does not cease to be maintainable even if the State Government revokes after the institution of the suit, the permission granted. If the State Government revokes the permission granted before the institution of the Suit then there would be no valid permission to sue. In other words the State Government's power to revoke the permission granted under section 3 (1) gets exhausted once the suit is validly instituted.

For the reasons mentioned above, this appeal fails and the same is dismissed. But in the circumstances of the case, we make no order as to costs.

PRESENT :—S.M. SIKRI, R.S. BAGHAWAT AND K.S. HEGDE, JJ.

The Union of India and others

.. Appellants*

v.

M/s. Rai Bahadur Shreeram Durgaprasad (P.) Ltd. and others. .. Respondents.

The Orissa Minerals Development Co. Ltd. & others .. Interveners.

Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, (VII of 1947), sections 12 (1), 12 (2), 22, 23 and 23 (A) and Central Government Notification dated 4th August, 1947—Interpretation—Export of goods, no one to export any goods from India without furnishing the declaration under section 12 (1)—Restrictions imposed by 12 (1) deemed to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878—Section 19 similar to section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act, 1947—Informations called for in prescribed form, if amount to restrictions under section 12 (1)—Under invoicing of consignments, a contravention of section 12 (2) and Rule (5) and not a contravention of section 12 (1).

Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, (VII of 1947), sections 12 (1), 12 (5) and 12 (6)—Interpretation—Export of goods, value thereof, primarily with by the Reserve Bank and not by the Customs authorities—Customs authorities only concerned to see that no goods are exported without furnishing the declaration under section 12 (1).

The respondents are exporters of Manganese Ore. It is said that they had exported large quantities of Manganese Ore after ostensibly complying with the formalities of law but in reality they had under-invoiced the various consignments sent by them and further that they had failed to repatriate foreign exchange of the value of about three crores of rupees obtained by them as the price of the Manganese Ore exported. It is said that by so doing they had contravened section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947 read with section 23 (A) of that Act and sections 19 and 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act.

The only question for decision is whether on the facts set out in the show cause notices, which facts have to be assumed to be correct for the purpose of these proceedings, the respondents can be held to have contravened section 12 (1).

Held by majority with Sikri, J. dissenting: Section 22 of the Act provides that no person when making an application or declaration to any authority or person for any purpose under the Act shall give any information or make any statement which he knows or has reasonable cause to believe to be false or not true, in any material particular. Section 23 prescribes that if any person contravenes the provisions of section 12 or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder he shall (a) be liable to such penalty not exceeding three times the value of the foreign exchange in respect of which the contravention has taken place, or five thousand rupees, whichever is more, as may be adjudged by the Director of Enforcement in the manner provided in the Act or (b) upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both. In view of these provisions it is clear that if the information given by the respondents in the aforementioned declarations was false to the knowledge of those who made those declarations. The contravention of the above provisions is punishable under section 23. Section 23 (A) as it stood at the relevant time provided that : without prejudice to the provisions of section 23 or any other provision contained in this Act, the restrictions imposed by sub-section (1) of section 12 shall be deemed to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878 and all provisions of that Act shall have effect accordingly, except that section 183 thereof shall have effect as if for the word 'shall' therein the word 'may' were substituted. If the allegations mentioned in the show cause notices come within the scope of a section 23 (A) then it necessarily follows that the will be governed by the provisions in section 19 and section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878. Section 19 of the Sea Customs Act provides that the Central Government may from time to time by notification in the Official Gazette prohibit or restrict the bringing or taking by sea or by land goods of any specified description into or out of India across any customs frontiers as defined by the Central Government. This section is similar to section 12 (1) of the Act. Section 167 (8) provides for punishments for offences under that Act.

Before a case can be held to fall within the scope of section 23-A it must be shown that there has been a contravention of the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). Therefore we have to find out what those restrictions are? The only restriction placed by section 12 (1) read with the Central Government Notification dated 4th August, 1947, is that no one should export any goods from this country without furnishing the declaration mentioned in section 12 (1). Admittedly the stipulated declarations in the prescribed forms have been furnished. The evidence specified have also been given. The declarations given do satisfy the requirements of section 12 (1) though they do not correctly furnish all the informations asked for in the form. Such declarations cannot be considered as non est. The informations called for in the prescribed form cannot be considered as restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). They are merely informations called for for the proper exercise of the powers under the Act. Many of them do not relate to the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). Neither section 12 (1) nor any other provision in the Act empower the rule-making authority to add to the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). For finding out the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1) we have only to look to that section. The requirement of that section is satisfied if the stipulated declaration supported by the evidence prescribed or specified is furnished. The contravention complained of in this case is really the contravention of section 12 (2) and rule 5. The former is punishable under section 23 and the latter under section 23 read with section 22. The main purpose of section 12 (1) is to get a declaration from the exporter that he has either brought or will bring back the amount representing the full export value of the goods exported. There are other provisions in the Act to deal with other situations.

There are two facets in every export, one relating to the goods exported and the other relating to the foreign exchange earned as a result of the export. Broadly speaking the former aspect is dealt with by the Customs authorities and the latter either by the Reserve Bank or by the Director of Enforcement. The price of goods exported has to be mentioned in the invoice. But the Reserve Bank has power to examine whether the price mentioned in the invoices correct. Section 12 (5) provides that where in relation to any goods exported the value as stated in the invoice is less than the amount which in the opinion of the Reserve Bank represents the full export value of those goods, the Reserve Bank may issue an order requiring the person holding the shipping documents to retain possession thereof until such time as the exporter of the goods has made arrangements for the Reserve Bank or a person authorised by the Reserve Bank to receive on behalf of the exporter payment in the prescribed manner of an amount which represents in the opinion of the Reserve Bank the full export value of the goods. Sub-section (6) of section 12 says that for the purpose of ensuring compliance with the provisions of that section and any orders or directions made thereunder, the Reserve Bank may require any person making any export of goods to which a notification under sub-section (1) applies to exhibit contracts with his foreign buyer or other evidence to show that the full amount payable by the said buyer in respect of the goods have been or will within the prescribed period by paid in the prescribed manner. These provisions go to indicate that so far as the value of the goods exported is concerned the matter is left primarily in the hands of the Reserve Bank, and the Customs Authorities are not burdened with that work. This aspect becomes relevant in ascertaining the true scope of section 12 (1). If we bear in mind the scheme of the Act, it is clear that so far as the Customs authorities are concerned all that they have to see is that no goods are exported without furnishing the declaration prescribed under section 12 (1). Once that stage is passed the rest of the matter is left in the hands of the Reserve Bank and the Director of Enforcement.

Per Sikri, J.—Section 12 (1) and the notification dated 4th August, 1947 made under it, impose a conditional prohibition. The section confers a power on an exporter to lift the bar by a unilateral declaration. When such a power is conferred on an exporter by a statute, good faith on his part must at least be implied and be a condition pre-requisite. This construction is necessary in order to prevent abuse of the power given by the Act. If the exporter makes a deliberately false declaration he controvenes section 12 (1) because he has not made the statutory declaration in good faith. It is not necessary to say that the declaration becomes a nullity because the breach of good faith, a condition pre-requisite, is itself a contravention of the conditional prohibition or restriction, within section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act read with section 23-A and section 12 (1) of the Exchange Act. Clerical mistakes and mistakes made bona fide even in respect of material particulars are not within the mischief of section 12 (1), but a deliberate falsehood and a deliberate evasion of the provisions of section 12 (1) come within section 12 (1). Otherwise the ambit of section 12 (1), read with section 23-A, would be narrowed to the point of extinction. An exporter and persons concerned in the export could with impunity give a deliberately false declaration but in apparent compliance with section 12 (1), and deprive this country of foreign exchange. An interpretation which will make a mockery of the section cannot be given. But what about persons concerned in the illegal export? It is the persons concerned in the export which in most cases enable the exporter to successfully evade the provisions of the Exchange Act. These persons are taken care of only under the Customs Act. If they are covered by section 167 (8), there is no reason to exclude the exporter himself. It is not unusual to make persons liable both to penalties under the Sea Customs Act and the Exchange Act. It is indeed conceded that if no declaration is given under section 12 (1) and the goods are exported, the exporter and the persons concerned in the export would be liable to be proceeded both under section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act and Exchange Control Act. There can be no distinction between such exporter and an exporter who gives a deliberately false declaration for the purpose of the applicability of section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act. Section 23-A read with section 12 (1) calls in the aid of Customs authorities to achieve the same object, but ropes in alongwith the exporter the persons concerned in the prohibited export.

The Court delivered the following judgments

Sikri, J.—These five appeals by certificate are directed against the judgment of the High Court of Madras whereby the High Court accepted the Writ Appeals against the judgment of Kailasam, J., in Writ Petitions Nos. 1592, 1593, 1594 and 1601 of 1966 and 3948 of 1965, and directed the issue of writs of prohibition to the Union of India, the Collector of Customs, Madras, and the Deputy Collector of Customs, Visakhapatnam, appellants before us, prohibiting them from taking any action in pursuance of certain show-cause notice issued by the Deputy Collector Customs, Visakhapatnam. Common questions of law are involved in these appeals and it would suffice if I give facts in Writ Petition No. 1592 of 1966 out of which Civil Appeal No. 45 of 1968 arises.

The relevant facts in that writ petition, for appreciating the points raised before us, are as follows : On 17th February, 1965, the Deputy Collector of Customs, Visakhapatnam, issued memorandum No. S/21/14/65 to M/s. Rai Bhadur Seth Shreeram Durgaprasad (Private) Ltd., Tumsar, and five others, hereinafter referred to as the Shippers. In this memorandum, in brief, it was stated that the Shippers had entered into a formal contract on 13th October, 1965, with M/s. Inter Continental Ores Supply Corporation, New York, for the Shipment of 20,000 tons of Indian Manganese Ore of the grade of 43 per cent Mn., from the port of Visakhapatnam at a price of $0.67 per unit of Manganese per dry long ton, f.o.b. Visakhapatnam Bombay. The Shippers exported from the port of Visakhapatnam 3,300 tons of Indian Manganese per S.S. 'ALPHEM' under the cover of Shipping Bill No. 187 dated 20th March, 1957, declaring therein that the export was being made in pursuance of the aforesaid contract. A G.R.I. form was attached. It was stated that a certain note-book which had been seized earlier in August, 1963 disclosed that a sum of $25298.24 was received on 21st April, 1957, from INOSCO, i.e., Intercontinental Ores Supply Corporation, New York, the consignee of the subject goods, the amount having been credited to an account in the name of Gangadhar Narsinghdas Agrawal with the Trust Co., of North America, 115, Broadway, New York. It was further alleged in the memorandum that the Shippers had derived financial benefits in respect of the subject export over and above those revealed to the Customs Authorities and/or other concerned authorities and the information about them was deliberately suppressed. It was further alleged that this constituted a contravention of section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, read with Notification No. 12 (17)-F. 1/47 dated 4th August, 1947, as amended issued thereunder and the Foreign Exchange Regulation Rules, 1952.

I may mention that by this notification the Central Government had prohibited

“the export otherwise than by post of any goods either directly or indirectly to any place outside India other than any of the countries or territories in the Schedule annexed to this order unless a declaration supported by such evidence as may be prescribed is furnished by the export to the prescribed authority that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been or will within the prescribed period be paid in the prescribed manner.”

According to the Deputy Collector Customs, the goods have been thus exported in contravention of the restrictions and prohibitions imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, read with section 12 (1) and the Notification No. 12 (17)-F. 1/47 dated 4th August, 1947, issued thereunder, and section 23-A of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, which exportation constituted an offence liable to be punished under section 167 (8) of this Sea Customs Act, 1878. Accordingly, the parties concerned were called upon to explain the matter and show cause in writing to the Collector of Customs, Madras, why a penalty should not be imposed on them him under section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878.

It appears that a number of such memoranda were issued in respect of diverse shipments. Thereupon five petitions were filed in the High Court at Madras. In Writ Petition No. 1592 of 1966 it was alleged that 125 show cause notices had been issued to the petitioners on various dates and it was prayed that a writ of prohibition or other appropriate writ, order or direction under Article 226 of the Constitution of India prohibiting the respondents from taking any action in pursuance of the said showcause memos. may be issued.

Various allegations were made but I need only mention the following allegations. It was submitted that the petitioners had complied with the statutory provisions inasmuch as a declaration in statutory form had been furnished to the prescribed authority, to wit the Collector of Customs, and the Collector of Customs, having passed the consignments for shipment, had no further right or jurisdiction to take proceedings relating to the consignments in question. It was contended that if a declaration is found to be false, it did not mean that there was a breach of the provisions of section 12 (1).

In reply it was contended that what was required under section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act and the Rules was not any value but the actual amount representing the full export value, and a mere declaration of any value would not be sufficient compliance with the provisions of section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Act.

The learned Single Judge, Kailasam, J., dismissed the petitions. Various points were urged but on the point addressed to us he held that the declaration to be given by the exporters meant not only that the value of the goods will be paid in the prescribed manner but also that the full export value of the goods given is the correct value.

I may mention that before the Division Bench the case of the Revenue was classified in an affidavit and we may set out para 5 thereof :

"Since the Court has now directed the respondents to file a supplemental affidavit clarifying the stand taken by the department I state respectfully that the stand taken by the department both in the show cause memo. and here is that the essence of the offence committed by the appellants is that in the declaration required under section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, they have deliberately given also particulars supported by false evidence. By giving this fraudulent declaration, they have secured the export of their goods. This fraud vitiates the declaration itself, thereby making the export one in violation of the prohibition contained in section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act."

It is not necessary to set out the modus operandi adopted by the petitioners but I may mention that it was contended that a scheme was entered into prior to the actual export and the goods were under-valued deliberately and the Department was induced to accept their declarations by means of false evidence and fraudulent suppression of facts. It is suggested that by this method a sum of Rs. 3,20,00,000 had been suppressed and there has been a failure to repatriate a corresponding amount of foreign exchange which had been earned surreptitiously. It was further stated that this scheme was adopted for all the shipments covered by the show cause notices, and also for many other shipment in respect of which show cause notices yet remain to be issued.

The Division Bench on appeal came to the conclusion that as the declarations were made under section 12 (1) and as they were scrutinised by the authorities it is not possible to contend that these goods were either exported or attempted to be exported in violation of the prohibitions or restrictions imposed by law and are, therefore, liable to be confiscated under section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act. The Division Bench further held that the alleged fraud on the part of the petitioners did not make any difference. According to the Division Bench 'if the petitioners had misled the authorities by false representations or failed thereby to repatriate foreign exchange, by virtue of his obligation under section 12 (2), these are different offences for which separate and specific penalties can be imposed.'

The relevant statutory provisions at the time of exportation were as follows:

section 12. (1)—The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, prohibit the taking or sending out by land, sea or air (hereafter in this section referred to as export) of any goods or class of goods specified in the notification from India directly or indirectly to any place or specified unless a declaration supported by such evidence as may be prescribed or so specified, is furnished by the exporter to the prescribed authority that the amount representing the full export value of the goods have been, or will within the prescribed period be paid in the prescribed manner.

(2) Where any export of goods have been made to which a notification under sub-section (1) applies, no person entitled to sell, or procure the sale of the said goods shall, except with the permission of the Reserve Bank, do or refrain from doing any act with intent to secure that,

(a) the sale of goods is delayed to an extent which is unreasonable having regard to the ordinary course of trade, or

(b) payment for the goods is made otherwise than in the prescribed manner or does not represent the full amount payable by the foreign buyer in respect of the goods, subject to such deductions, if any, as may be allowed by the Reserve Bank, or is delayed to such extent as aforesaid :

Provided that no proceedings in respect of any contravention of this sub-section shall be instituted unless the prescribed period has expired and payment for the goods representing the full amount as aforesaid has not been made in the prescribed manner.

(3) Where in relation to any such goods the said period has expired and the goods have not been sold and payment therefor has not been made as aforesaid, the Reserve Bank may give to any person entitled to sell the goods or to procure the sale thereof, such directions as appear to it to be expedient for the purpose of securing the sale of the goods and payment therefor as aforesaid and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions, may direct that the goods shall be assigned to the Central Government or to a person specified in the directions.

(4) Where any goods are assigned in accordance with sub-section (3), the Central Government shall pay to the person assigning them such sum in consideration of the net sum recovered by or on behalf of the Central Government in respect of the goods as may be determined by the Central Government.

(5) Where in relation to any such goods the value as stated in the invoice is less than the amount which is the opinion of the Reserve Bank represents the full export value of those goods, the Reserve Bank may issue an order requiring the person holding the shipping documents to retain possession thereof until such time as the exporter of the goods has made arrangements for the Reserve Bank or a person authorised by the Reserve Bank to receive on behalf of the exporter payment in the prescribed manner of an amount which represents in the opinion of the Reserve Bank the full export value of the goods.

(6) For the purpose of ensuring compliance with the provisions of this section and any order or directions made thereunder, the Reserve Bank may require any person making any export of goods to which a notification under sub-section (1) applies to exhibit contracts with his foreign buyer or other evidence to show that the full amount payable by the said buyer in respect of the goods has been, or will within the prescribed period be, paid in the prescribed manner.

Section 22.—No person shall, when complying with any order or direction under section 19 or with any requirement under section 19-B or when making any application or declaration to any authority or person for any purpose under this Act, give any information or make any statement which he knows or has reasonable cause to believe to be false, or not true, in any material particulars.

Section 23.—(1) If any person contravenes the provisions of section 4, section 5 section 9 or sub-section (2) of section 12 or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder, he shall—

(a) be liable to such penalty not exceeding three times the value of the foreign exchange in respect of which the contravention has taken place, or five thousand rupees, whichever is more, as may be adjudged by the Director of Enforcement in the manner hereinafter provided, or

(b) upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

(1-A) Whoever contravenes—

(a) any of the provisions of this Act or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder, other than those referred to in sub-section (1) of this section and section 19, shall, upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

(b) any direction or order made under section 19 shall, upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees.

(1-B) Any Court trying a contravention under sub-section (1) or sub-section (1-A) and the authority adjudging any contravention under clause (a) of sub-section (1) may, if it thinks fit, and in addition to any sentence or penalty which it may impose for such contravention, direct that any currency, security, gold or silver, or goods or any other money or property, in respect of which the contravention has taken place, shall be confiscated to the Central Government and further direct that the foreign exchange holdings, if any, of the person committing the contravention or any part thereof shall be brought back into India or shall be retained outside India in accordance with the directions made in this behalf.

Explanation.—For the purpose of this sub-section, property in respect of which contravention has taken place shall include deposits in a bank, where the said property is converted into such deposits.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in section 32 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, it shall be lawful for any Magistrate of the first class, specially empowered in this behalf by the State Government, and for any Presidency Magistrate to pass a sentence of fine exceeding two thousand rupees on any person convicted of an offence punishable under this section.

(3) No Court shall take cognizance—

(a) of any offence punishable under sub-section (1) except upon complaint in writing made by the Director of Enforcement, or

(b) of any offence punishable under sub-section (1-A) of this section or under section 54 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, as applied by section 19 of this Act, except upon complaint in writing made by the Director of Enforcement or any officer authorised in this behalf by the Central Government or the Reserve Bank by a general or special order:

Provided that where any such offence is the contravention of any of the provisions of this Act or any rule, direction or order made thereunder which prohibits the doing of an act without permission, no such complaint, shall be made unless the person accused of the offence has been given an opportunity of showing that he had such permission.

(4) Nothing in the first proviso to section 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, shall apply to any offence punishable under this section.

Section 23-A—Without prejudice to any provisions of section 23 or to any other provision contained in this Act, the restrictions imposed by sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 8, sub-section (1) of section 12 and clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 13 shall be deemed to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1879, and all the provisions of that Act shall have effect accordingly, except that section 183 thereof shall have effect as if for the word “shall” therein the word “may” were substituted.”

3. Form of declaration.—(1) A declaration under section 12 of the Act shall be in one of the forms set out in the First Schedule as the Reserve Bank may by notification in the Gazette of India specify as appropriate to the requirements of a case.

(2) Declarations shall be executed in sets of such number as indicated on the forms.

4. Authority to whom declaration to be furnished.—(1) The original of the declaration shall be furnished to the Collector of Customs; provided that when export is by post, the original of the declaration shall be furnished to the postal authorities.

5. Evidence in support of declaration.—(1) The Reserve Bank or subject to such directions, if any, as may be given by the Reserve Bank, the Collector of Customs or the postal authorities, may, to satisfy themselves of due compliance with section 12 of the Act, require such evidence in support of the declaration as may satisfy them that the exporter is a person resident in India, or has a place of business in India.

(2) The Reserve Bank, or subject to such directions, if any, as may be given by the Reserve Bank, the Collector of Customs, or the Postal authorities may requires any exporter to produce in support of the declaration such evidence as may be in his possession or power to satisfy them.

(ii) that the invoice value stated in the declaration is the full value of the goods; and (iii) that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been or will be paid to the exporter. Explanation....."

The points which have emerged from the discussion at the Bar and which require determination may be formulated thus:

(1) What is the meaning of the expression "restrictions imposed by sub-section (1) of section 12" occurring in section 23-A of the Exchange Act? Can other sections of the Exchange Act be looked at for determining the ambit of the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1)? Do restrictions imposed under the Rules made under the Exchange Act and relating to section 12 (1) come within the meaning of this expression?

(2) What is the true meaning of the words

"a declaration supported by such evidence as may be prescribed or so specified is furnished by the exporter to the prescribed authority that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been or will within the prescribed period be paid in the prescribed manner"?

Is it necessary that the declaration shall be made honestly or in good faith? Should it disclose the true export value? Is it a breach of the subsection if a declaration is made honestly but happens to show incorrect export value to a small but not material extent? Does not a deliberately false declaration contravene the provisions of section 12 (1)?

(3) If an action is a contravention of section 12 (1) and other provisions of the Exchange Act, e.g., sections 22, 23, 12 (2), 12 (3) and 12 (5), was it the intention that it should be treated as a contravention of section 12 (1)?

Before dealing with point (1) mentioned above, a few preliminary observations may be made. I have to construe an Act which was enacted in the interest of the national economy. A deliberate large-scale contravention of its provisions would affect the interests of every man, woman and child in the country. Such an Act, I apprehend, should be construed so as to make it workable, it should, however, receive a fair construction, doing no violence to the language employed by the Legislature. It was said that if two constructions are possible the one that is in favour of the subject should be accepted. It is not necessary to pronounce on this proposition for I have come to the conclusion that there is one true construction of section 12 (1). But I should not be taken to be assenting to this proposition in so far as it is applicable to an enactment like the Exchange Act, for no subject has a right to sabotage the national economy.

Coming to the first point, I find that the following words of Lord Blackburn express my views as to how the construction of section 23-A should be approached. He was dealing with a case where a single section of an Act of Parliament has been introduced into another Act. He said in *The Mayor of Portsmouth v. Charles Smith*¹ :

"When a single section of an Act of Parliament is introduced into another Act, I think it must be read in the sense which it bore in the original Act from which it is taken, and that consequently it is perfectly legitimate to refer to all the rest of that Act in order to ascertain what the section meant, though those other sections are not incorporated in the new Act. I do not mean that if there was in the original Act a section not incorporated, which came by the way of a proviso or exception on that which is incorporated, that should be referred to. But all others, including the interpretation clause, if there be one, may be referred to."

It seems to me that this is the correct way of looking at section 23-A of the Exchange Act for another reason. The restrictions imposed by section 12 (1) cannot be different for the purpose of the Exchange Act from that for the purposes of section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act, for a breach of section 12 (1) may also be punishable under the Exchange Act. In other words, the same contravention may attract penalties under the Sea Customs Act as well as the Exchange Act, and it would be incongruous to hold that the restrictions imposed by a section are different for different Acts.

Then am I entitled to take into account the restrictions imposed by the Rules made under section 27 of the Exchange Act? It seems to me that rules not referable to section 12 (1) cannot be taken into account, but any restrictions imposed by rules referable to section 12 (1) must be treated as restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). Section 12 (1) itself contemplates rules being made on three points, i.e., (1) the evidence which is to support the declaration, (2) the authority to which the declaration is to be furnished; and (3) manner of payment. It was said that the words "by section 12 (1)" exclude the restrictions made under the Rules. But though in some contexts and scheme of an Act this proposition may be true, the general rule is as stated by Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Wellingdale v. Norris,² as follows :

"If it be said that a regulation is not a provision of an Act, I am of opinion that *Rex v. Walker*³, is an authority against that proposition. I should certainly have been prepared to hold apart from authority that, where a statute enable an authority to make regulations, a regulation made under the Act, becomes for the purpose of obedience or disobedience a provision of the Act. The regulation is only the machinery by which Parliament has determined whether certain things shall or shall not be done."

These observations were approved by the House of Lords in *Wicks v. Director of Public Prosecution*¹, thus:

"There is, of course, no doubt that, when a statute like the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, enables an authority to make regulations, a regulation which is validly made under the Act, i.e., which is intra vires of the regulation making authority, should be regarded as though it were itself an enactment. As the Court of Criminal Appeal has pointed out in its judgment, that was decided by the Divisional Court in *Willingdale v. Norris*², and it appears to me that that decision is perfectly correct. Consequently, the charge against the appellant here was, in effect, that he had committed crimes defined or contained in the Act of Parliament."

The Court of Criminal Appeals has stated in *R. v. Wicks*³, as follows:

"The first observation which the Court would make is that they are in complete agreement with the decision of the Divisional Court in *Willingdale v. Norris*² that, where a statute enables an authority to make regulations, a regulation made under the Act becomes for the purpose of obedience or disobedience a provision of the Act. The regulation is only the machinery by which Parliament has determined whether certain things shall or shall not be done. It is, therefore, clear that the regulations must be read as though they were contained in the Act itself. They derive their efficacy solely from the Act and accordingly expire with the Act, but it may be that the Legislature has provided that some restrictions or consequences shall remain effective notwithstanding the expiration of the Act."

In a recent case, *Rathbone v. Eundock*⁴, the Divisional Court following these cases held that regulation 89 of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1955, was for the purpose of obedience or disobedience a provision of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

In *Dr. Indramani Pyarelal Gupta v. W. R. Nathu and others*⁵, this Court was concerned, inter alia, with the interpretation of section 3 (1) of the Forward Contract (Regulation) Act, 1952, which used the words "such duties as may be assigned by or under this Act." Ayyangar, J., speaking for the majority, observed:

"Learned Counsel is undoubtedly right in his submission that a power conferred by a by-law is not one conferred "by the Act" for in the context the expression "conferred by the Act" would mean "conferred expressly or by necessary implication by the Act itself. . . . The words "under the Act" would, in that context, signify what is not directly to be found in the statute itself but is conferred or imposed by virtue of powers enabling this to be done; in other words, by laws made by a subordinate law-making authority which is empowered to do so by the parent Act. This distinction is thus between what is directly done by the enactment and what is done indirectly by rule-making authorities which are vested with powers in that behalf by the Act. (vide *Hubli Electricity, Bombay Ltd. v. Province of Bombay*⁶, and *Narayanaswami Naidu v. Krishna Murthi*⁷."

The observations of Subba Rao, J., as he then was, at page 775, relied upon by the appellants are these:

1. (1947) 1 All E.R. 205, 206.

2. (1909) 1 K.B. 57, 64.

3. (1946) 2 All E.R. 529, 531.

4. (1962) 2 All E.R. 257.

"I would, therefore, construe the words "by or under this Act, or as may be prescribed" as follows: "by this Act" applies to powers assigned proprio vigore by the provisions of the Act; "Under this Act" applies to an assignment made in exercise of an express power conferred under the provisions of the Act; and "may be prescribed" takes in an assignment made in exercise of a power conferred under a rule. This construction gives a natural meaning to the plain words used in the section and avoids stretching the language of a statutory provision to save an illegal by-law."

In my opinion that case does not assist me because the Court was construing the words "by or under the Act," and Ayyangar, J., specifically discussed the meaning of "by the Act" in the context.

Regarding the case of *United States v. George R. Eaton*¹, relied on appellants' behalf, I find that the Supreme Court of the United States explained and distinguished that case in *Singer v. United States*² as follows;

"*United States v. Eaton*¹, turned on its special facts, as *United States v. Grimaud*³, emphasizes. It has not been construed to state a fixed principle that a regulation can never be a "law" for purposes of criminal prosecutions. It may or may not be, depending on the structure of the particular statute. The Eaton case¹ involved a statute which levied a tax on cleomargarine and regulated in detail cleomargarine manufacturers. Section 5 of the statute provided for the keeping of such books and records as the Secretary of the Treasury might require. But it provided no penalty for non-compliance. Other sections, however, laid down other requirements for manufacturers, and prescribed penalties for violations. Section 20 gave the Secretary the power to make "all needful regulations" for enforcing the Act. A regulation was promulgated under section 20 requiring wholesalers to keep a prescribed record. The prosecution was for non-compliance with that regulation. Section 18 imposed criminal penalties for failure to do any of the things "required by law." The Court held that the violation of the regulation promulgated under section 20 was not an offence. It reasoned that since Congress had prescribed penalties for certain acts but not for the failure to keep books the omission could not be supplied by regulation. And Congress had not added criminal sanctions to the rules promulgated under section 20 of the Act."

I would in this connection prefer to apply the English decisions referred to above as section 12 (1) itself does not impose any restrictions and contemplates certain things to be prescribed.

Coming now to the construction of section 12 (1), it seems to me that what it requires is a declaration of some actual figure which according to the declarant represents 'the full export value.' Otherwise there is no point in requiring support of such evidence as may be prescribed. Further it is clear that some actual figure has to be mentioned when the exporter declares that he has received the amount representing the full export value. I apprehend that the same applies in the case where the amount has not yet been received. The rules make this clear. Rule 5 (2) (ii) which require the invoice value stated in the declaration to be the full export value of goods, is referable to section 12 (1) of the Exchange Act and may be taken to indicate that an actual figure has to be mentioned. It may be an estimate if the goods have not been sold before the export, but a figure must be indicated.

Coming to the crux of the problem, does section 12 (1) by itself require absolutely correct particulars? It is said that section 12 (1) does not require it for section 22 requires the exporter only to make a declaration "which he knows or has reasonable cause to be false or not true in any material particulars." How could it be that if section 12 (1) itself requires absolutely correct particulars, section 22 limits the requirement? It seems to me that there is force in this contention but only to a limited extent. Section 12 (1) and the notification dated 4th August, 1947, made under it, impose a conditional prohibition. The section confers a power on an exporter to lift the bar by a unilateral declaration. When such a power is conferred on an exporter by a statute, good faith on his part must at least be implied and be a condition pre-requisite. This construction is necessary in order to prevent abuse of the power given by the Act. (See Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 11th Edition, page 116). If the exporter makes a deliberately false declaration he contravenes section 12 (1) because he has not made the statutory declaration in good faith. It is not necessary to say that the declaration becomes a nullity because the breach of good faith, a condition pre-requisite, is itself a contravention of the conditional prohibition or restriction, within section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act read with section 23-A and section 12 (1) of the Exchange Act. Clerical mistakes and mistakes made bona fide even in respect of material particulars are not within the mischief of section 12 (1), but a deliberate falsehood and a deliberate evasion of the provisions of section 12 (1) come within section 12 (1). Otherwise the ambit of section 12 (1), read with section 23-A, would be narrowed to the point of extinction. An exporter and persons concerned in the export could with impunity give a deliberately false declaration but in apparent compliance with section 12 (1), and deprive this country of foreign exchange. I can not give an interpretation which will make a mockery of the section. But it is said that other sections of the Exchange Act will take care of such an exporter. He can be prosecuted under section 23 (1-A) read with section 22. He can be sentenced to imprisonment which may extend to two years. He can also be fined to an unlimited extent. The Foreign Exchange lost can be retrieved by a Court acting under section 23 (1-B). This may be true that the exporter is liable as stated above. But what about persons concerned in the illegal export? It is the persons concerned in the export which in most cases enable the exporter to successfully evade the provisions of the Exchange Act. These persons are taken care of only under the Customs Act. If they are covered by section 167 (8), there is no reason to exclude the exporter himself. It is not unusual to make persons liable both to penalties under the Sea Customs Act and the Exchange Act. It is indeed conceded that if no declaration is given under section 12 (1) and the goods are exported, the exporter and the persons concerned in the export would be liable to be proceeded both under section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act and the Exchange Control Act. I can draw no distinction between such an exporter and an exporter who gives a deliberately false declaration for the purpose of the applicability of section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act.

I am not impressed by the argument that the Foreign Exchange Act deals with the basic policy regarding foreign exchange and it was not the intention to punish offenders who violate foreign exchange restrictions under the Sea Customs Act. It is section 23-A of the Exchange Act which itself deems the restrictions imposed under section 12 (1) to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act. Not only that. The opening sentence of section 23-A makes it clear that this is without prejudice to section 23 and to any other provisions in the Exchange Act. In other words, the provisions of section 23 and other relevant sections are not affected or limited. They will have their full operation.

The fact that the exporter may be proceeded under section 12 (2) (I may assume that this is so for the purpose of this case) for non-payment of the full amount payable by the foreign buyer, or that the Reserve Bank can in the eventualities mentioned in section 12 (5) require the holding up of shipping documents or that the Reserve Bank by exercising powers under section 12 (6) secure contracts and other evidence to discover the full amount payable do not throw any light on the Construction of section 23-A and section 12 (1) except that the Legislature is anxious that the "full export value" shall be received in this country. Section 23-A read with section 12 (1) calls in the aid of Customs authorities to achieve the same object, but ropes in alongwith the exporter the persons concerned in the prohibited export.

I am not able to appreciate how the existence of section 167 (37), section 167 (72) and section 167 (81) is of any assistance for the purpose of interpreting section 23-A and section 12 (1) of the Exchange Act. It may be—I do not decide it—that an exporter, like the respondents, will also be liable to be proceeded against under these items of section 167.

Taking the facts as alleged by the Customs authorities to be true, as they must be taken to be true for the purpose of this application under Article 226, it seems to me that no case for the issue of a writ of prohibition has been made out. In the result the judgment of the Appeal Court is reversed and that of the learned Single Judge restored. The appellants will have costs incurred in this Court. One hearing fee.

Hegde, J. for Bachawat, J., and himself—We had the advantage of studying the judgment just now delivered by our brother Sikri, J, but we regret that we are unable to agree with the conclusions reached by him. After carefully analysing the arguments advanced before us we have come to the conclusion that no grounds were made out to interfere with the order of the Appellate Bench of the Madras High Court. We shall now proceed to give our reasons in support of our conclusion.

The respondents in these appeals are exporters of manganese ore. It is sad that they had exported large quantities of manganese ore after ostensibly complying with the formalities of law but in reality they had under-invoiced the various consignments sent by them and further that they had failed to repatriate foreign exchange of the value of about three crores of rupees obtained by them as the price of the manganese ore exported. It is said that by so doing they had contravened section 12 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act 1947 (to be hereinafter referred to as the Act) read with section 23 (A) of that Act and sections 19 and 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act. The case for the appellants is that during the search of the house of some of the respondents on suspicion that they had hoarded gold certain documents from the house of some of the respondents were seized and those documents disclosed the facts set out above. On the basis of the said information the Deputy Collector of Customs Visakhapatnam issued several notices to the respondents requiring them to show cause why action should not be taken against them under the aforementioned provisions. On receipt of those notices the respondents moved the High Court of Madras under Article 226 of the Constitution praying that that Court may be pleased quash the show cause notices in question and prohibit the appellants from taking any further action on the basis of those notices. Those petitions were dismissed by Kailasam, J., on 1st September, 1966 but his orders were reversed by the Appellate Bench of that Court by its judgment dated 12th September, 1967. The Appellate Bench granted the reliefs prayed for by the respondents. It is as against that decision these appeals have been brought after obtaining the necessary certificates from the High Court.

The only question that arises for decision in these appeals is whether on the facts set out in the show cause notices, which facts have to be assumed to be correct for the purpose of these proceedings, the respondents can be held to have contravened section 12 (1) which reads:

“The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, prohibit the taking or sending out by land, sea or air (hereinafter in this section referred to as export) of any goods or class of goods specified in the notification from India directly or indirectly to any place so specified unless a declaration supported by such evidence as may be prescribed or specified, is furnished by the exporter to the prescribed authority that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been, or will within the prescribed period be, paid in the prescribed manner.”

On 4th August, 1947, the Central Government issued a notification prohibiting the export of all goods to any place outside India unless a declaration supported by such evidence as may be prescribed is furnished by the exporter to the prescribed authority that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been or will within the prescribed period be, paid in the prescribed manner. Rule 3 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Rules 1952 framed under section 27 of the Act provides that a declaration under section 12 of the Act shall be in one of the forms set out in the First Schedule as the Reserve Bank may by notification in the Official Gazette specify as appropriate to the requirements of a case. The form that is relevant for our present purpose is G. R. 1. Rule 5 empowers the Reserve Bank, the Collector of Customs or the postal authorities, to require the exporter to furnish such evidence in support of the declaration as may satisfy them that the exporter is a person resident in India or has a place of business in India. These authorities may also require the exporter to produce in support of the declaration such evidence as may be in his possession or power to satisfy them (i) that the destination stated on the declaration is the final place of destination of the goods exported; (ii) that the invoice value stated in the declaration is the full export value of the goods, and (iii) that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been or will be paid to the exporter. Form G. R. 1 stipulates that the exporter should furnish the information called for therein. Therein the exporter is also required to make the following declaration:

"I hereby declare that I am the seller/consignor of the goods in respect of which this declaration is made and that the particulars given above are true and (a) that the invoice value declared is the full export value of the goods and is the same as that contracted with the buyer; (b) that this is a fair valuation of the goods which are unsold.

I/My principals undertake that I/they will deliver to the bank mentioned below the foreign exchange/rupee proceeds resulting from the export of these goods or before....."

It is not denied that the respondents before exporting the goods in question had furnished declarations in the prescribed forms. Therein they had declared that the full export value of the goods has been or will within the prescribed period be paid in the prescribed manner. It is also not denied that they had furnished to the appropriate authorities the prescribed evidence. The case against them as mentioned earlier, is that they had under-invoiced the goods and failed to repatriate a portion of the foreign exchange earned by them. It is also alleged that they gave incorrect information in their declarations. If these allegations are correct which we have to assume to be correct for the purpose of this case, then it is obvious that the declarations given by the respondents do not comply with the requirements of rule 5.

Section 22 of the Act provides that no person when making an application or declaration to any authority or person for any purpose under the Act shall give any information or make any statement which he knows or has reasonable cause to believe to be false or not true, in any material particular. Section 23 prescribes that if any person contravenes the provisions of section 12 or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder he shall (a) be liable to such penalty not exceeding three times the value of the foreign exchange in respect of which the contravention has taken place, or five thousand rupees, whichever is more, as may be adjudged by the Director of Enforcement in the manner provided in the Act or (b) upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both. In view of these provisions it was not disputed before us that if the information given by the respondents in the aforementioned declarations was false to the knowledge of those who made those declarations or if they had reasonable cause to believe that it was false or not true in any material particular then they are liable to be dealt with under section 23.

Sub-section (2) of section 12 provides that:

"Where any export of goods has been made to which a notification under sub-section (1) applies, no person entitled to sell, or procure the sale of the sale goods shall, except with the permission of the Reserve Bank, do or refrain from doing anything or take or refrain from taking any action which has the effect of securing that :....."

(b) payment for the goods is made otherwise than in the prescribed manner or does not represent the full amount payable by the foreign buyer in respect of the goods, subject to such deductions, if any, as may be allowed by the Reserve Bank, or is delayed to such extent as aforesaid."

The contravention of the above provisions is punishable under section 23. Hence the respondents' failure to repatriate any part of the foreign exchange earned by them by the sale of the manganese ore exported can be penalised by imposing on them a penalty not exceeding three times the value of the foreign exchange in respect of which the contravention had taken place or Rs. 5,000 which ever is more as may be adjudged by the Director of Enforcement in the manner provided in the Act. Hence it is open to the Director of Enforcement to levy on such of the respondents as have contravened section 12 (2) penalty not exceeding three times the value of the foreign exchange not repatriated which in the present case can be about nine crores of rupees. They may also be punished under section 23 (1) (b). This position is conceded by the Counsel appearing for the appellants. But it is urged on behalf of the appellants that for the offences committed by the respondents they are not only liable to be punished under section 23 but also under section 23 (A). The Appellate Bench of the Madras High Court negatived that contention. Section 23 (A) as it stood at the relevant time provided that:

"Without prejudice to the provisions of section 23 or any other provision contained in this Act, the restrictions imposed by.....sub-section (1) of section 12.....shall be deemed to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act 1878 and all provisions of that Act shall have effect accordingly, except that section 183, thereof shall have effect as if for the word "shall" therein the word 'may' were substituted."

If the allegations mentioned in the show cause notices come within the scope of section 23 (A) then it necessarily follows that they will be governed by the provisions in section 19 and section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878. Section 19 of the Sea Customs Act provides:

"that the Central Government may from time to time by notification in the official gazette prohibit or restrict the bringing or taking by sea or by land goods of any specified description into or out of India across any customs frontiers as defined by the Central Government."

This section is similar to section 12 (1) of the Act. Section 167 (8) provides for punishments for offences under that Act. That section to the extent material for our present purpose reads:

"The offences mentioned in the first column of the following schedule shall be punishable to the extent mentioned in the third column of the same with reference to such offences respectively:

Offences	Sections of this Act to which offence has reference.	Penalties.
1	2	3
8. If any goods, the importation or exportation of which is for the time being prohibited or restricted by or under Chapter IV of this Act, be imported into or exported from India contrary to such prohibition or restriction; or	18 & 19	such goods shall be liable to confiscation; and any person concerned in any such offence shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding three times the value of the goods, or not exceeding one thousand rupees.

if any attempt be made so to import or export any such goods; or if any such goods be found in any package produced to any officer of Customs as containing no such goods; or if any such goods, or any dutiable goods, be found either before or after landing or shipment to have been concealed in any manner on board of any vessel within the limits of any port in India; or if any goods, the exportation of which is prohibited or restricted as aforesaid, be brought to any wharf in order to be put on board of any vessel for exportation contrary to such prohibition or restriction.

If an offence falls under section 23-A the fact that the said offence is also punishable under section 23 is immaterial. The provisions of section 23 (A) are without prejudice to the provisions of section 23. The mere fact that the offences alleged against the respondents are punishable under section 23 would not exclude the application of section 23 (A). Therefore all that we have to see is whether those offences fall within the ambit of section 23 (A). If they do then the impugned show cause notices must be held to be valid. If they do not, then no proceeding can be taken on the basis of those notices.

Before a case can be held to fall within the scope of section 23 (A) it must be shown that there has been a contravention of the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). Therefore we have to find out what those restrictions are? The only restriction placed by section 12 (1) read with the Central Government Notification dated 4th August, 1947, is that no one should export any goods from this country without furnishing the declaration mentioned in section 12 (1). Admittedly the stipulated declarations in the prescribed forms have been furnished. The evidence specified have also been given. Therefore prima facie there was no contravention of section 12 (1). What is said against the respondents is that the invoice price mentioned by them in the declarations did not represent the full export value; hence the declarations given by them are invalid declarations which means that the concerned goods were exported without furnishing the declaration required by section 12 (1). It is not possible to accept this argument. The declarations given do satisfy the requirements of section 12 (1) though they do not correctly furnish all the informations asked for in the form. Such declarations cannot be considered as non-est. The informations called for in the prescribed form cannot be considered as restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). They are merely informations called for the proper exercise of the powers under the Act. Many of them do not relate to the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). Neither section 12 (1) nor any other provision in the Act empower the rule making authority to add to the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). For finding out the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1) we have only to look to that section. The requirement of that section is satisfied if the stipulated declaration supported by the evidence prescribed or specified is furnished. The contravention complained of in this case is really the contravention of section 12 (2) and rule 5. The former is punishable under section 23 and the latter under section 23 read with section 22.

The declaration required by section 12 (1) is only to the effect that the amount representing the full export value of the goods has been or will within the prescribed period be, paid in the prescribed manner. This is as it should be because this section governs both the goods sold to the foreign buyers as well as those sent on consignment basis. So far as the goods sold to the foreign buyer are concerned it is generally possible for the exporter to know the exact value but that would not be the position when the goods are sent on consignment basis. In the case of goods sent on consignment basis, the exporter can give only an estimated value. The main purpose of section 12 (1) is to get a declaration from the exporter that he has either brought or will bring back the amount representing the full export value of the goods exported. There are other provisions in the Act to deal with other situations. We shall presently refer to them.

If we are to hold that every declaration which does not state accurately the full export value of the goods exported is a contravention of the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1) then all exports on consignment basis must be held to contravene the restrictions imposed by section 12 (1). Admittedly section 12 (1) governs every type of export. Again it is hard to believe that the Legislature intended that any minor mistake in giving the full export value should be penalised in the manner provided in section 23 (A). The wording of section 12 (1) does not support such a conclusion. Such a conclusion does not accord with the purpose of section 12 (1).

It is true that the regulations contained in the Act are enacted in the economic and financial interest of this country. The contravention of those regulations, which we were told are widespread are affecting vital economic interest of this country. Therefore the rigour and sanctity of those regulations should be maintained but at the same time it should not be forgotten that section 12 (1) is a penal section. The true rule of construction of a section like section 12 (1) is, if we may say so with respect, as mentioned by Plowman, J. in *Re H. P. C. Productions Ltd.*¹. Therein the learned Judge observed:

"I approach the question of the construction of the Exchange Control Act in the light of principles stated by Upjohn J. in *London and Country Commercial Properties Investments v. Attorney-General*² to which Mr. Bagnall referred. In that case the Court was concerned with the construction of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act 1946 and the Control of Borrowing Order 1947. Upjohn J. said: "the first question I have to consider is what are the principles of construction which I must adopt in construing this Act and this order. . . . I have to bear in mind that this is a penal statute. It indeed, I suppose, represents the high water mark of the Parliamentary invasion of the traditional rights of the subjects of this realm." Then he went on to explain why that was so and continued; "In those circumstances what are the canons of construction to be adopted? I do not propose to refer to the authorities at length. I think that the proper approach to the construction of such a statute as this is that I must construe it as I would any other instrument, that is to say, I must look at all the surrounding circumstances, I must look at the mischief intended to be remedied, I must above all give effect to the words that have been used in the section. That is plain from the decision in Dyke v. Elliot,³ see in particular, the judgment of James L.J. but if on construing the relevant sections of the Act and the order there appears any reasonable doubt or ambiguity then being a penal statute I must apply the principles laid down succinctly by Lord Esher in Tuck and sons v. Priestar.⁴"

"Where penalties for infringement are imposed it is not legitimate to stretch the language of a rule, however beneficent its intention, beyond the fair and ordinary meaning of its language."

This Court in *Tolaram Relumal and another v. State of Bombay*¹, speaking through Mahajan, C.J. observed:

"It is not competent to the Court to stretch the meaning of an expression used by the Legislature in order to carry out the intention of the Legislature."

Hereinbefore we have examined the language of section 12 (1) and its purpose. We have also referred to the provisions which provide for the punishment of the contraventions complained of in these cases. Those provisions are adequate to meet the situation. In our opinion the language of section 12 (1) does not permit the acceptance of the interpretation placed on it by the appellants nor are we able to come to the conclusion that the Legislature intended that the offences complained of in these proceedings should be made punishable under section 23 (A). If the interpretation sought to be placed by the appellants on section 12 (1) is accepted it may result in unnecessary hardship in numerous cases.

There are two facets in every export, one relating to the goods exported and the other relating to the foreign exchange earned as a result of the export. Broadly speaking the former aspect is dealt with by the Customs authorities and the latter either by the Reserve Bank or by the Director of Enforcement. The price of goods exported has to be mentioned in the invoice. But the Reserve Bank has power to examine whether the price mentioned in the invoice is correct. Section 12 (5) provides that where in relation to any goods exported the value as stated in the invoice is less than the amount which in the opinion of the Reserve Bank represents the full export value of those goods, the Reserve Bank may issue an order requiring the person holding the shipping documents to retain possession thereof until such time as the exporter of the goods has made arrangements for the Reserve Bank or a person authorised by the Reserve Bank to receive on behalf of the exporter payment in the prescribed manner of an amount which represents in the opinion of the Reserve Bank the full export value of the goods. Sub-section (6) of section 12 says that for the purpose of ensuring compliance with the provisions of that section and any orders or directions made thereunder, the Reserve Bank may require any person making any export of goods to which a notification under sub-section (1) applies to exhibit contracts with his foreign buyer or other evidence to show that the full amount payable by the said buyer in respect of the goods have been or will within the prescribed period be paid in the prescribed manner. These provisions go to indicate that so far as the value of the goods exported is concerned the matter is left primarily in the hands of the Reserve Bank and the Customs authorities are not burdened with that work. This aspect becomes relevant in ascertaining the true scope of section 12 (1). If we bear in mind the scheme of the Act, it is clear that so far as the Customs authorities are concerned all that they have to see is that no goods are exported without furnishing the declaration prescribed under section 12 (1). Once that stage is passed the rest of the matter is left in the hands of the Reserve Bank and the Director of Enforcement.

In view of our above conclusion it is unnecessary for us to examine the other contentions advanced on behalf of the parties. In the result these appeals fail and they are dismissed with costs. One hearing fee.

ORDER

In accordance with the opinion of the majority, these appeals are dismissed with costs. One hearing fee.

Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (III of 1888) as amended by Act (XIV of 1961), sections 365, 366, 367, 368 and 372—Scope—Carcass deleterious to public health—Removal of carcass through the Municipal agency at the expense of its owner, if infringes the guarantee of freedom under Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution—Restriction on the owner's rights to dispose of property (i.e. carcass) commensurate with the need of protection of the interest of the public against the exercise of the right.

Constitution of India (1950), Articles 19 (1) (f), 19 (5), 31 and 31 (5) (b) (ii)—Scope—Law imposing reasonable restriction upon the right of a citizen to dispose of property, not free from the challenge of violation under Article 31—Extinction of the right of the owner of the moveable property (carcass) to destroy it for abating nuisance and preventing danger to public health covered by exemption contained in Article 31 (5) (b) (ii).

Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution confers upon all citizens the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property. Carcass of an animal belonging to a person is his property and he has the right of disposal of the carcass. But that fundamental right, like all other rights in Article 19 (1), is not absolute: it is subject to reasonable restrictions.

A carcass being in its very nature a noxious thing, if allowed to remain on the premises of the owner or occupier, is likely to cause serious harm to the health and well-being of the residents and other persons in the neighbourhood. The law which imposes on the owner or the occupier of the place in which the carcass is found, duty to remove the carcass or to get it removed through the Municipal agency with the least practicable delay is conceived in the interests of the general public. A law designed to abate a grave nuisance and for protection of public health is prima facie one enacted for the protection of the interests of the general public. But that alone is not sufficient: the restriction imposed by the law must be reasonable, i.e., the restriction must not be arbitrary or excessive, and must not place upon the right of the citizen a limitation which is not calculated to ensure protection of the interests of the general public.

Reasonableness of restriction imposed by a law has to be adjudged in the light of the nature of the right, danger or injury which may be inherent in the unbridled exercise of the right and the necessity of protection against danger which may result to the public by the exercise of the right. In each the test is whether the restriction is commensurate with the need of protection of the interest of the public against the exercise of the right. But the fact that the owner is unable to sell for a price the carcass and is required to pay a fee for removal of the carcass does not, render a provision which is essentially conceived in the interests of the general public, unreasonable. The Corporation has to arrange for effectively disposing of the carcass, and it would be necessary for effectuating that purpose to provide that the title of the owner in the carcass should be extinguished. Unless the title of the owner in the carcass is extinguished, various complications may arise in the way of disposal of the carcass. If the carcass is likely to be deleterious to public health and its removal from the place where it is lying being in the interests of the public health, imposition of an obligation upon the owner to remove the carcass at his own expense or to pay for its removal, cannot, be regarded as unreasonable, even if the charge which falls upon the owner is in addition to the loss which he suffers by reason of the extinction of his title in the carcass. If the owner's right to dispose of his property is by the enactment of the impugned section subjected to reasonable restrictions, it must follow that the right of the skinner, assuming that he has a right in the carcass, is also subjected to reasonable restrictions, imposed in the interests of the general public.

* C.A. No. 1654 of 1966 and

The impugned provisions do not infringe the guarantee of freedom under Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. But even if it be established that the law which imposes a reasonable restriction upon the right of a citizen to acquire, hold and dispose of property, is not on that account free from the challenge that it infringes the guaranteed freedom under Article 31. It is sufficient for the purpose of this case to hold that a law declaring extinction of the right of the owner in moveable property not with a view to use it for a public purpose but to destroy it for abating nuisance and preventing danger to public health and vesting it in the Corporation entrusted with power to take steps to maintain public health is not a law for acquisition of property for a public purpose. In any event the law is not, because of the exemption contained clause (5) (b) (ii) of Article 31 of the Constitution, invalid even if it does not provide for payment of compensation for deprivation of the right to property. The owner of the carcass is, therefore, unable to sustain his plea that Article 19 (1) (f) and Article 31 (2) were infringed by the impugned provisions.

The first respondent is carrying on business as a skinner of carcass and claims protection of its fundamental right under Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution. The first respondent cannot claim the protection of Article 31 (2) of the Constitution, because until it purchases the carcasses from the owner it has no right in the property, and it cannot set up a grievance for loss of property which it does not own.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Shah, J.—The High Court of Bombay has declared section 372 (g) and a part of section 385 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act III of 1888 as amended by Act XIV of 1961 ultra vires because in their view these provisions infringe the guarantee of Articles 19 (1) (f) and (g) of the Constitution. The State of Maharashtra and the Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay have appealed to this Court.

The first respondent in Appeal No. 1654 of 1966 is a society registered under the Societies Registration Act, 1860, and carries on, within the limits of Greater Bombay, the business of skinning carcasses of dead animals and utilising the products for industrial uses. The second respondent is an owner of a stable of milch-cattle at Andheri within the limits of Greater Bombay. By Act XIV of 1961 the Legislature of the State of Maharashtra amended, amongst others, sections 367, 372 and 385 of Act III of 1888 enacting that an owner of the carcass of a dead animal shall deposit it at the place appointed in that behalf by the Corporation, and entrusted the Corporation with power to arrange for disposal of the carcasses. On October, 1961 the Assistant Head Supervisor of the Municipal Corporation called upon the first respondent to stop removing carcasses from the "K" Ward of the Corporation. On 27th November, 1961, the Corporation published a notification inviting the attention of the public concerned to the provisions of section 385 and other provisions of the Act and warned the persons concerned that violation of the provisions was liable to be punished. On 10th January, 1962, the Corporation resolved to grant a contract authorising removal and disposal of carcasses under section 385 of the Act in respect of Wards, H. K. L. M. E. P. B. & T. to the Harijan Workmen's Co-operative Labour Society Ltd., and declared that no other person or agency was authorised to remove and dispose of carcasses under the provisions of section 385 of the Act.

Respondents Nos. 1 and 2 to this appeal moved a petition in the High Court of Bombay for an order cancelling or setting aside the notice dated 14th October, 1961, and the notification dated 27th November, 1961; for an order restraining the Corporation from demanding fee for removal of such carcasses, from taking any steps or proceedings against the respondents for enforcement of the provisions of sections 366, 367 (c), 372 (g) and 385 of the Act and from claiming ownership in the carcasses of the dead animals of private owners. The State of Maharashtra was later impleaded as a party-respondent to the petition.

Kantawalla, J., dismissed the petition. He held that sections 366, 367 (c) and 385 of the Act were "enacted for the promotion of public health and for the prevention of danger to life of the community and in the larger interest of the public," and that the restrictions upon the rights of the owners of cattle and persons carrying on business in carcasses were, because of the special protection granted by Article 31 (5) (b) (ii) not inconsistent with or repugnant to the fundamental rights guaranteed under Article 31 (2) of the Constitution, and since the impugned provisions were protected, the second respondent could not claim that his fundamental right guaranteed by Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution was infringed. The learned Judge also held that the restrictions imposed by the impugned provisions were reasonable and in the interest of the general public and were on that account not within the protection of Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution.

In appeal under the Letters Patent the High Court modified the order passed by Kantawalla, J., and declared section 372 (g) and a part of section 385 of the Act invalid. The High Court did not pass any order consequential on the declaration. Against that order the State of Maharashtra has preferred this appeal with certificate granted by the High Court.

Section 3 (c) defines 'nuisance': it includes any act, omission, place, or thing which causes or is likely to cause injury, danger, annoyance or offence to the sense of sight, smelling or hearing, or which is or may be dangerous to life or injurious to health or property. Section 61 sets out the obligatory and discretionary duties of the corporation. It is thereby incumbent upon the Corporation to make adequate provision, inter alia, for scavenging, removal and disposal of excrementitious and other filthy matters, and of all ashes, refuse and rubbish, reclamation of unhealthy localities, removal of noxious vegetation and generally the abatement of all nuisances. By sections 365, 366, 367, 368, 372 and 385 it was provided that—

Section 365—"For the purposes of securing the efficient scavenging and cleansing of all streets and premises, the Commissioner shall take measures for securing—

(a) * * * *

(b) the removal of the contents of all receptacles and depots and of the accumulations at all places provided or appointed by him under section 367 or 368 for the temporary deposit of any of the matters specified in the said sections."

Section 366—"All matters collected by municipal servants or contractors in pursuance of the last preceding section and of section 369 and carcasses of dead animals deposited in any public receptacle, depot or place under section 367 shall be the property of the Corporation."

Section 367—"The Commissioner shall provide or appoint in proper and convenient situations public receptacles, depots and places for the temporary deposit or final disposal of—

- (a) dust, ashes, refuse and rubbish ;
- (b) trade refuse;
- (c) carcasses of dead animals and excrementitious and polluted matter;

Provided that—

(i) the said matters shall not be finally disposed of in any place or manner in which the same have not heretofore been so disposed of, without the sanction of the corporation or in any place or manner which the State Government think fit to disallow;

(ii) any power conferred by this section shall be exercised in such manner as to create the least practicable nuisance."

Section 368—" (1) It shall be incumbent on the owners and occupiers of all premises to cause all dust, ashes, refuse, rubbish and trade refuse to be collected from their respective premises and to be deposited at such times as the Commissioner, by public notice, from time to time prescribes in the public receptacle, depot or place provided or appointed under the last preceding section or the temporary deposit or final disposal thereof.

* * * * *

Section 372—"No person—

(a) who is bound, under section 368 or section 370, to cause the removal of dust, ashes, refuse, rubbish and trade refuse or of excrementitious or polluted matter, shall allow the same to accumulate on his premises for more than twenty-four hours, or neglect to cause the same to be removed to the depot, receptacle or place provided or appointed for that purpose;

* * * * *

(g) shall deposit the skin or otherwise dispose of the carcass of any dead animal at a place not provided or appointed for this purpose under section 367."

Section 385—" (1) It shall be the duty of the Commissioner to provide for the removal of the carcasses of all animals dying within Greater Bombay;

(2) The occupier of any premises in or upon which the animals shall die or in or upon which the carcass of any animal shall be found, and the person having the charge of any animal which dies in the street or in any open place, shall within three hours after the death of such animal, or if the death occurs at night, within three hours after sunrise, report the death of such animal at the municipal health department office of the division of the Greater Bombay in which the death occurred or in which the carcass is found and shall not unless authorised by the Commissioner in this behalf, remove or permit to be removed the carcass of any animal dying in or upon any place within Greater Bombay;

The Provision of the Act while dealing with Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices have an important bearing and impact on the economic condition and well-being of the community.

Sheo Mahadeo Singh v.
The State of Bihar.
 CrI. A. No. 88 of 1967.

Penal Code (XLV of 1860), section 149—Essence of the section.

The essence of section 149 is that an accused person whose case falls within the terms of the section cannot put forward the defence that he did not with his own hand commit the offence committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly. It is an offence committed by a member of an unlawful assembly and it is an offence such as the members of that assembly have to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.

Section 149 creates a specific offence and deals with the punishment of that offence. The emphasis is on common object. There is no question of common intention. The act must be one which upon the evidence appears to have been done with a view to accomplishing the common object attributed to the members of the unlawful assembly. Thus every person who is engaged in prosecuting the same object, although he had no intention to commit the offence, will be guilty of an offence which fulfills or tends to fulfil the object which he is himself engaged in prosecuting in the circumstances mentioned in the section. It is in this sense that common object is to be understood.

 CrI. App. No. 180 of 1967.

Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), section 410—Scope—Appeal under—Arguable and substantial questions raised—Summary dismissal improper.

The right to prefer an appeal from sentence of Court of session is conferred by section 410 of the Criminal P. C. The right to appeal is one both on a matter of fact and a matter of law.

The following principles emerge from the decisions : First, the appellate Court under section 410, Criminal Procedure Code, undoubtedly has power to summary dismissal. Secondly, if the appeal raises arguable and substantial points the High Court should give reasons for rejection of appeal. Thirdly, rejection of an appeal by using only one word of dismissal causes difficulties and embarrassment in finding out the reasons which weighed with the High Court in dismissal of the appeal in limine. Fourthly, the High Court should not summarily reject criminal appeals if they raise arguable and substantial points.

 C.A. No. 169 of 1967.

Bihar Land Reforms Act (XXX of 1956), section 7 (1) and 5—Scope and applicability of section 7 (1)—‘Building or structure used as factory’—Import of.

Section 7 (1) only applies to such buildings or structures together with the lands on which they stand which are used as golas, factories or mills for the purpose of trade, manufacture or commerce or used for storing grains or keeping cattle or implements for the purpose of agriculture. The expression employed by the Legislature is “used as golas, factories or mills”, and not “used for golas, factories or mills." The expression "lands on which they stand" may include the land which is necessary for the efficient user of the building for the purpose for which it is intended to be used. It cannot however be held that because a factory has, for the benefit of the workmen and managing staff working in the factory, constructed buildings used as bungalows, quarters for employees, clubs, kitchens, garage, dispensary, rest-house, out-house, etc., but which are not directly used as factory or mill buildings, the buildings would be deemed to fall within section 7 (1) as buildings in the possession of an intermediary and used as golas, factories or mills. These lands are homestead and are claimable by an intermediary under section 5 (1) : if they are used for the purpose of letting out, they would be liable to pay fair and equitable ground-rent under the proviso to section 5 (1).

The definition of "factory" in the Factories Act, cannot be a guide, much less a useful guide, in determining the meaning of the expression "factory" as used in the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950.

Specific Relief Act (XLVII of 1963), section 34—Master and servant—Illegal dismissal from service—Suit for declaration by servant that he is still in service—Maintainability.

Although in case of illegal termination or dismissal of a servant, the servant concerned could claim damages he cannot ask for or be granted a declaration that he should be treated as if he was still in service. The law as settled by the Supreme Court is that no declaration to enforce a contract of personal service will be normally granted. The well recognised exceptions to this rule are (1) where a public servant has been dismissed from service in contravention of Article 311 of the Constitution ; (2) where reinstatement is sought of a dismissed worker under the industrial law by labour or industrial tribunals ; (3) where a statutory body has acted in breach of a mandatory obligation imposed by statute.

Central Excise and Salt Act (I of 1944)—Assessment by assessing authority under—A quasi-judicial function—Judgment of assessing authority cannot be controlled by directions from appellate authority.

An assessment under the Central Excise and Salt Act by a subordinate officer in accordance with the instructions issued by the Collector of Central Excise and Customs to whom an appeal lies against the order of that subordinate officer cannot be called a valid assessment in the eye of law. No authority, however high, can control the decision of a judicial or a quasi-judicial authority, that being the essence of our judicial system.

In the present case, when the assessment is to be made by the Deputy Superintendent or the Assistant Collector, Central Excise, the Collector to whom an appeal lies against the order of assessment cannot control or fetter his judgment in the matter of assessment.

The assessing authorities exercise quasi-judicial functions and they have duty cast on them to act in a judicial and independent manner. If their judgment is controlled by the directions given by the Collector it cannot be said to be their independent judgment in any sense of the word. An appeal then to the Collector becomes an empty formality.

Crl. A. No. 256 of 1969.

Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), section 159—Power of Magistrate under—Ambit of—Magistrate if can stop investigation by police and proceed to hold the enquiry himself.

Under section 159 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the only power, which the Magistrate can exercise on receiving a report from the officer in charge of a police station, is to make an order in those cases which are covered by the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 157, viz., cases in which the officer in charge of the police station does not proceed to investigate the case. Section 159 does not empower a Magistrate to stop investigation by the police and proceed to hold the enquiry himself.

On the face of it, the first alternative of directing an investigation in section 159 cannot arise in a case where the report itself shows that investigation by the police is going on in accordance with section 156. It is to be noticed that the second alternative does not give the Magistrate an unqualified power to proceed himself or depute any Magistrate to hold the preliminary enquiry. That power is preceded by the condition that he may do so, "if he thinks fit." The use of this expression makes it clear that section 159 is primarily meant to give to the Magistrate the power of directing an investigation in cases where the police decide not to investigate the case under the proviso to section 157 (1) and it is in those cases that, "if he thinks fit", he can choose the second alternative. Thus, the power conferred by the second clause in section 159 is only an alternative to the power given by the first clause and can, therefore, be exercised only in those cases in which the first clause is applicable.

The scheme of sections 156 to 159 of the Criminal Procedure Code clearly is that the power of the police to investigate any cognizable offence is uncontrolled by the Magistrate, and it is only in cases where the police decide not to investigate the case that the Magistrate can intervene and either direct an investigation, or in the alternative himself proceed or depute a Magistrate subordinate to him to proceed to enquiry into the case.

C.A. No. 364 of 1967.

Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act (II of 1929)—Applicability.

On a true construction of the Hindu Law of inheritance (Amendment) Act (II of 1929), it applies not only to a case of a Hindu male dying intestate on or after 21st February, 1929 (when the Act came into force) but also to a case of a Hindu male dying intestate before the Act came into operation and succeeded by a female heir with a life estate who died after that date.

Thus, the point of time for the applicability of the Act is when the succession opens, viz., when the life estate terminates. In consequence, it must be further held that the question as to who is the nearest heir will fall to be settled at the date of expiry of the ownership for life or lives. The death of a Hindu female life-estate holder opens the inheritance to the reversioners and the one most nearly related at the time to the last full owner becomes entitled to the estate.

Delhi and Ajmer Rent Control Act (XXXVIII of 1952), section 13 (1)—Scope—Decree for ejectment on the basis of compromise—Legality.

From the language used in section 13 (1) of the Delhi and Ajmer Rent Control Act (1952), it is clear that after the Act came into force, a decree for recovery of possession can be passed by any Court only if that Court is satisfied that one or more of the grounds mentioned in section 13 (1) are established. Without such a satisfaction, the Court is incompetent to pass a decree for possession. In other words, the jurisdiction of the Court to pass a decree for recovery of possession of any premises depends upon its satisfaction that one or more of the grounds mentioned in section 13 (1) have been proved.

In the present case at no stage, the Court was called upon to apply its mind to the question whether the alleged sub-letting is true or not. It is clear from the record that the Court proceeded to pass a decree for ejectment solely on the basis of the compromise arrived at between the parties. That being so there can be hardly any doubt that the Court was not competent to pass the impugned decree. Hence it must be held to be a nullity and no execution can be levied on the basis of such a decree.

The State of Gujarat.
Crl. A. No. 100 of 1967.

Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), section 429—Reference under to the third judge—Powers of third judge.

Penal Code (XLV of 1860), sections 34 and 320—"Common intention"—Common intention to kill Y—X killed by mistake—Common liability if attracted.

Section 429 of the Criminal Procedure Code states "that when the judges comprising the Court of appeal are equally divided in opinion, the case with their opinion thereon, shall be laid before another judge of the same Court and such judge, after such hearing, if any, as he thinks fit, shall deliver his opinion, and the judgment or order shall follow such opinion." Two things are noticeable; first that the case shall be laid before another judge, and secondly, the judgment and order will follow the opinion of the third judge. It is therefore manifest that the third judge can or will deal with the whole case. Hence the contention that the third judge under section 429 could only deal with the differences between the two judges and not with the whole case is untenable.

The dominant feature of section 34 is the element of participation in actions. Common intention implies acting in concert. There is a pre-arranged plan which is proved either from conduct or from circumstances or from incriminating facts. The principle of joint liability in the doing of a criminal act is embodied in section 34 of the Penal Code. The existence of common intention is to be basis of liability.

A mistake by one of some of the accused as to killing X in place of Y would not displace the common intention if the evidence showed the concerted action in furtherance of a pre-arranged plan.

4. for service over 15 years .. one month's wages for every year of service."

The reference related to workmen only and did not apply to the clerical staff of mistries.

There are two workmens' Unions in the Delhi region—the Kapra Mazdoor Ekta Union—hereinafter called 'Ekta Union', and the other, the Textile Mazdoor Union. The Ekta Union made a claim principally for fixation of gratuity in addition to the benefit of provident fund admissible to the workmen under the Employees Provident Fund Act, to be computed on the consolidated wages inclusive of dearness allowance. The Ekta Union submitted by its statement of claim that a gratuity scheme based on the region-cum-industry principle, i.e., a uniform scheme applicable to all the four units be framed. The Textile Mazdoor Union also supported the claim for the framing of a gratuity scheme on the basis of the consolidated wages of workmen but claimed that the scheme should be unit-wise. At the trial, it appears that both the Unions pressed for a unit-wise scheme of gratuity.

The Tribunal entered upon the reference in respect of the fixation of gratuity scheme in February, 1964 and made an award on 30th June, 1966, operative from 1st January, 1964. The award was published on 4th August, 1966. By the award two schemes were framed—one relating to the D. C. M. and S. B. M., and another relating to the B. C. M. and A. T. M. Under the second scheme the digit by which the number of completed year of service was to be multiplied in determining the total gratuity was smaller than the digit applicable in the case of the D. C. M. and the S. B. M. The distinction was made between the two sets of units, because the D. C. M. and S. B. M. were, in the view of the Tribunal, more prosperous units than the B. C. M. and A. T. M. The A. T. M., it was found, was a new-comer in the field of textile manufacture, and had for many years been in financial difficulties.

The D. C. M. employs more than 8000 workmen in its textile unit; the S. B. M. has on its roll 5000 workmen; the B. C. M. has 6271 workmen and the A. T. M. has 1500 workmen. The D. C. M. and S. B. M. have a common retirement benefit scheme in operation since the year 1940. Under the scheme gratuity payable to workmen is determined by the length of service before retirement. The scheme of gratuity in operation in the D. C. M. and S. B. M. is that:

"In case of retirement from service of the Mills as a result of physical disability, due to overage or on account of death after a minimum of seven years' service in the concern.

7 years	..	Rs. 350
8 years	..	Rs. 425
9 years	..	Rs. 500
10 years	..	Rs. 575
11 years	..	Rs. 650
12 years	..	Rs. 725
13 years	..	Rs. 800
14 years	..	Rs. 875
15 years	..	Rs. 950
16 years	..	Rs. 1050
17 years	..	Rs. 1150
18 years	..	Rs. 1250

19 years	.. Rs. 1350
20 years	.. Rs. 1500."

The scale of gratuity, it is clear, is independent of the individual wage scale of the workman. In the B. C. M. and A. T. M. units there are no such schemes.

Till the year 1958, there were no standardised wages in the textile industry. According to the Report of the Central Wage Board for the Cotton Textile Industry which was published on 22nd November, 1959, there were in India 39 regions in which the textile industry was located. The basic monthly wages of the workmen in the year 1958 varied between Rs. 18 in Patna and Rs. 30 in various centres like Bombay, Indore, Madras, Coimbatore, Madurai, Bhiwani, Hissar, Ludhiana, Cannanore and certain regions in Rajasthan and Delhi. The wage Board recommended in Paragraph 106 of its Report :

"The Board has come to the conclusion that an increase at the average rate of Rs. 8 per month per worker shall be given to all workers in mills of category I from 1st January, 1960, and a further flat increase of Rs. 2 per month per worker shall be given to them from 1st January, 1962. Likewise an increase at the average rate of Rs. 6 per month per worker shall be given to all the workers in mills of category II from 1st January, 1960, and a further flat increase of Rs. 2 per month per worker shall be given to them from 1st January, 1962. These increases are subject to the condition that the said sums of Rs. 8 and Rs. 6 shall ensure not less than Rs. 7 and Rs. 5 respectively to the lowest paid, and that the increase of Rs. 2 from 1st January, 1962 shall be flat for all."

Category I included the Delhi region. Since 1st January, 1962, the basic minimum wage in the Delhi region is, therefore, Rs. 40 according to the recommendations of the Wage Board. In Bombay City and Island (including Kurla), the basic wage, according to the Report of the Wage Board, was also Rs. 30 and by the addition of Rs. 10 the basic wage of a workman came to Rs. 40. The workmen in other important textile centres also get the same rates.

The Tribunal was of the view that the average basic wage of the workmen is Rs. 60 since the implementation of the Wage Board in the Delhi region. No argument was advanced before this Court challenging the correctness of that assumption, by the employers or the workmen. It was also common ground that practically uniform basic wage levels prevail in all the large textile centres like Bombay, Ahmedabad, Coimbatore and Indore.

Besides the basic wage the workmen receive dearness allowance under diverse awards made by the Industrial Tribunals which "seek for neutralize the cost of living index." There is also a provident fund scheme under the Employees Provident Fund Act, 1962, whereunder 8% of the basic wage and the dearness allowance and the retaining allowance for the time being in force is contributed by the employees. Besides, there is a right to retrenchment compensation under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (section 25 FFF) and the Employees Insurance Scheme. In view of the observations of this Court in *Burhanpur Tapti Mill's Ltd. v. Burhanpur Tapti Mills Mazdoor Sangh*¹, that :

"It is no longer open to doubt that a scheme of gratuity can be introduced in concerns where there already exist other schemes such as provident fund or retrenchment compensation. This has been ruled in a number of cases of this Court and recently again in *Wenger & Co. and others v. Their Workmen*² and *Indian Hume Pipe Company Ltd. v. Their Workmen*³. It is held in these cases that although provident fund and gratuity are benefits available at retirement they are not the same and one can exist with the other",

1. (1965) 1 L.L.J. 453 : (1965) 2 S.C.J. 737.
2. (1963) 2 L.L.J. 403.

3. (1960) S.C.J. 550 : (1959) 2 L.L.J. 830.

No serious argument was advanced that the existence of these additional benefits disentitled the workmen to obtain benefits under a gratuity schemes if the employer is able to meet the additional burden.

But on behalf of all the employers it was urged that—(1) in determining the quantum of gratuity, basic wage alone could be taken into account and not the consolidated wage; and (2) it was necessary for the Tribunal to fix when introducing a gratuity scheme the age of superannuation. On behalf of the D.C.M., S.B.M. and B.C.M. it was urged in addition that a uniform scheme applicable to the entire industry on the region-cum-industry basis should have been adopted and not a scheme or schemes applicable to individual units. On behalf of the A. T. M. it was urged that its financial condition is not and has never been stable and the burden of payment of gratuity to workmen dying or disabled or on voluntary retirement from service or when their employment is terminated is excessive and the Unit was unable, to bear that burden. It was also urged on behalf of the A.T.M. that in view of a settlement which was reached between the management and workmen it was not open to the Tribunal to ignore that settlement and to impose a scheme for payment of gratuity in favour of the workmen in this reference.

While broadly supporting the award of the Tribunal the workmen claim certain modifications. They claim that a shorter period of qualifying service for workmen voluntarily retiring should be provided, and gratuity should be worked out by the application of a larger multiple of days for each completed year of service; that the ceiling of gratuity should be related to a larger number of months' wages; that gratuity should be awarded for dismissal even for misconduct; that provision should be made for payment of gratuity to Badli workmen irrespective of the numbered days for which they work in a year; that the expression "average of the basic wage" should be appropriately clarified to avoid disputes in the implementation of the gratuity scheme, and that the award should be made operative not from 1st January, 1964, but from the date of the reference to the Tribunal.

The two schemes which have been framed may be set out :

ANNEXURE 'A'

"Gratuity scheme applicable to the Delhi Cloth Mills and the Swatantra Bharat Mills.

Gratuity will be payable to the employees concerned, in this reference, on the scale and subject to the conditions laid down below :

1. On the death of employee while in the service of the mill company or on his becoming physically or mentally incapacitated for further service :

(a) After 5 years continuous 12 days' wages for each completed year service and less than 10 of service, years' service.

(b) After continuous service of 10 15 days' wages for each completed years, year of service."

The gratuity will be paid in each case under clauses 1 (a) and 1 (b) to the employees, his heirs or executors or nominee as the case may be :

Provided that in no case will an employee, who is in service on the date on which this scheme is brought into operation, be paid an amount less than what he would have been entitled to under the pre-existing scheme of the Employees' Benefit Fund Trust:

(ii) Provided further that the maximum payment to be made shall not exceed the equivalent of 15 months wages:

(iii) Provided further that gratuity under this scheme will not be payable to any employee who has already received gratuity under the pre-existing scheme of the Employees' Benefit Fund Trust.

2. On voluntary retirement or 15 days' wages for each completed resignation after 15 years' year of service.
service.

Provided that the maximum payment to be made shall not exceed the equivalent of 15 months' wages.

3. On termination of service on, As in clauses 1 (a) and 1 (b) above.
any ground whatsoever except on the ground of misconduct.

Provided that the maximum payment to be made shall not exceed the equivalent of 15 months' wages.

4. Definitions:

(a) "Wages"

The term "wages" in the scheme will mean the average of the basic wage plus the dearness allowance drawn during 12 months next preceding death, incapacitation, voluntary retirement, resignation or termination of service and will not include overtime wages.

(b) "Basic wages"

The term "basic wage" will have the meaning as defined in paragraph 110 of the Report of the First Central Wage Board for Cotton Textile Industry.

(c) "Continuous service"

"Continuous service" means un-interrupted service and includes service which may be interrupted on account of sickness, authorised leave, strike which is not illegal, lockout or cessation of work which is not due to any fault on the part of the employee:

Provided that interruption in service upto six months' duration at any one time and 18 months' duration in the aggregate of the nature other than those specified above shall not cause the employee to lose the credit for previous service in the mills for the purpose of calculation of gratuity, but at the same time shall not entitle him to claim benefit of gratuity for period of such interruption. Service for the purposes of gratuity will include service under the previous management whether in the particular mill or other sister mill under the same management.

(d) "Resignation"

The word "resignation" will include abandonment of service by an employee provided he submits his resignation within a period of three months from the first day of absence without leave.

(e) "Length of service"

For counting "length of service," fraction of a year exceeding six months shall count as one full year, and six months or less shall be ignored.

5. "Application for gratuity"

Any person eligible to claim payment of gratuity under this scheme shall, so far as possible, send a written application to the employer within a period of six months from the date its payment becomes due.

6. "Payment of gratuity"

The employer shall pay the amount of gratuity to employee and in the event of his death before the payment to the person or persons entitled to it under clause 1 above within a period of 90 days of the claim being presented to the employer and found valid.

7. "Claims by persons who are no longer in service"

Claims by persons who are no longer in service of the Company on the date of the publication of this award shall not be entertained unless the claims are preferred within six months from the date of publication of this award.

8. "Badli service"

Gratuity shall be paid for only those years of Badli Service in which the employee has worked for not less than 240 days.

9. "Proof of incapacity"

In proof of physical or mental incapacity, it will be necessary to produce a certificate from any one of the Medical Authorities out of a panel to be jointly drawn up by the parties.

10. "Nomination"

(a) Each employee shall, within six months from the date of the publication of this award, make a nomination conferring the right to receive the amount of gratuity that may be due to him in the event of his death, before payment has been made.

(b) A nomination made under sub-clause a) above may, at any time, be modified by the employee after giving a written notice of his intention of doing so. If the nominee pre-deceases the employee, the interest of the nominee shall revert to the employee who may make a fresh nomination in respect such interest."

ANNEXURE 'B'

Gratuity scheme applicable to the Birla Cotton Spinning and Weaving Mills and the Ajudhia Textile Mills.

Gratuity will be payable to the employees concerned in this reference, on the scale and subject to the conditions laid down below :—

1. On the death of an employee while in the service of the Mill company or on his becoming physically or mentally incapacitated for further service :

(a) After 5 years continuous service and less than 10 years service. One fourth month's wages for each completed year of service.

(b) After continuous service of 10 years. One third month's wages for each completed year of service.

"The gratuity will be paid in each case under clauses 1 (a) and 1 (b) to the employee, his heirs or executors, or nominee, as the case may be.

Provided that the maximum payment to be made shall not exceed the equivalent of 12 months' wages.

3. On termination of service by As in clauses 1 (a) and 1 (b) above.
the employer for any reason whatsoever except on the ground of misconduct.

Provided that the maximum payment to be made shall not exceed the equivalent of 12 months' wages."

[Clauses 4 to 10 of Annexure 'B' are the same as in Annexure 'A' and need not be repeated.]

Whether against the A.T.M., the Tribunal was incompetent to make an award framing a scheme for payment of gratuity may first be considered. Counsel for the A.T.M. urged that there was a settlement between the workmen and the management of the A.T.M. in consequence of which the Tribunal was incompetent to make an award. The facts on which reliance was placed are these. After the dispute was referred to the Industrial Tribunal, there were negotiations between the management of the A.T.M. and workmen represented by the two Unions and an agreement was reached, the terms whereof were recorded in writing. Clauses 6 and 11 (4) of the agreement relate to the claim for gratuity:

"6. The workmen agree not to claim any further increase in wages, basic or dearness, or make any other demand involving financial burdens on the Company either on their initiative or as a result of any award, till such time as the working of the mills results in profits.

11. The parties hereto agree to jointly withdraw in terms of this settlement, the following pending cases and proceedings before the Courts, Tribunals and Authorities and more especially—

* * * * *

(4) With regard to I. D. No. 70 of 1958, the workers agree not to claim any benefits that may be granted under the above reference by the Hon'ble Industrial Tribunal in case the award is given in favour of the workmen, subject to clause 7 above."

(It is common ground that reference to clause 7 is erroneous: it should be to clause 6.)

The workmen and the management of the unit submitted an application before the Tribunal on 28th December, 1959, admitting that there had been an "overall settlement" of all the pending disputes between the management of A.T.M. and its workmen represented by the two Unions, and requested that an interim award be made in terms of the agreement insofar as the dispute related to the A.T.M. No order was passed by the Tribunal on that application. On 4th June, 1962, the Manager of the A.T.M. applied to the Tribunal that an interim award be pronounced in terms of the agreement. The workmen had apparently changed their attitude by that time and filed a written statement and requested that the prayer contained in paragraph-3 of the application "be rejected as impermissible in law." The Tribunal made an order on 26th November, 1962 and observed:

".....the only interpretation that can be given to clause 11 (4) of the settlement read with clause 7 is, that the workers of the Ajudhia Textile Mills had bound themselves not to claim any benefits that might be granted by the Tribunal is the award on the present reference, if it turns out to be in favour of the workmen unless and until the working of the Mills results in profit. The fact that the passing of an award on the demands was envisaged under the settlement goes to show that the demands were to be adjudicated upon in any case.

The main case will now proceed in respect of all the mills and the effect of the settlement and of the application dated 28th December, 1959, and of the 5th July, 1962 will be considered at the time of the final award."

But in making the final award the Tribunal did not specifically refer to the settlement. The terms of clause 6 of the settlement clearly show that if it be found that the A.T.M. had acquired financial stability, it will be liable to pay gratuity to the workmen. We are unable to agree with the contention of Counsel for the A.T.M. that it was intended by the parties that the adjudication proceedings against the A.T.M. should be dropped, and after the A.T.M. became financially stable a fresh claim should be made by the workmen on which a reference may be made by the Government for adjudication of the claim for gratuity against the A.T.M. The contention by the management of the A.T.M. that the Tribunal was incompetent to determine the gratuity payable to the workmen of the A.T.M. must therefore fail.

The other contention raised on behalf of the A.T.M. that its financial position was "unstable" need not detain us. The Tribunal has held that the A.T.M. was working at a loss since the year 1953-54 and the losses aggregated to Rs. 6.22 lakhs in the year 1958-59, but thereafter the financial position of the unit improved. The trading account for the period ending 31st March, 1966, showed profits amounting to Rs. 3.10 lakhs. In 1960-61 there was a surplus of Rs. 11.18 lakhs out of which adjusting the depreciation, development rebate reserve and reserve for bad and doubtful debts, there was a balance of Rs. 7.10 lakhs. In 1961-62, the net profits of the Unit amounted to Rs. 7.48 lakhs and the A.T.M. distributed Rs. 52,500 as dividend. In 1962-63, there was a gross profit of Rs. 4.18 lakhs and after adjusting depreciation and development rebate reserve there was a net deficit of Rs. 30,517. In 1963-64, there was a gross profit of Rs. 14.29 lakhs and after adjusting depreciation, reserve for doubtful debts, bonus to employees and development rebate reserve, there remained a net profit of Rs. 4.71 lakhs. The Tribunal observed that by 1961-62 all previous losses of the Unit were wiped out and that even during the year 1962-63 in which there was labour unrest the gross profits were substantial and taking into consideration the reserves built by the Company "the picture was not disheartening and from the great progress that had been made since 1959-60 there was every reason to think that the Mill had achieved stability and reasonable prosperity and that it had an assured future", and the Company was in a position to meet the burden of a modest gratuity scheme. We see no reason to disagree with the finding recorded by the Tribunal on this question.

On behalf of the D.C.M., S.B.M. and B.C.M., it was urged that normally gratuity schemes are framed on the region-cum-industry principle, i.e. a uniform scheme applicable to all units in a region is framed, and no ground for departure from that rule was made out. It was urged that this Court has accepted invariably the region-cum-industry principle in fixing the rates at which gratuity should be paid. In our judgment no such rule has been enunciated by this Court. In Bhagarkhand Textile Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Textile Labour Association, Ahmedabad, this Court in dealing with the question whether the Industrial Court had committed an error in dealing with the claim for gratuity on industry-wise basis negatived the contention of the employers that the unit wise basis was the only basis which could be adopted in fixing the rates of gratuity. It was observed at page 345:

"Equality of competitive conditions is in a sense necessary from the point of view of the employers themselves; that, in fact, was the claim made by the Association which suggested that the gratuity scheme should be framed on industry-wise basis spread over the whole of the country. Similarly equality of benefits such as gratuity is likely to secure contentment and satisfaction of the employees and lead to industrial peace and harmony. If similar gratuity schemes are framed for all the units of the industry migration of employees from one unit to another is inevitably checked, and industrial disputes arising from unequal treatment in that behalf are minimised. Thus, from the point of view of both employers and employees industry-wise approach is on the whole desirable."

It is clear that the Court rejected in that case the argument that rates of gratuity should be determined unit-wise; the Court did not rule that in all cases the region-cum-industry principle should be adopted in fixing the rates of gratuity. That was made explicit in a later judgment of this Court; Burhanpur Tapti Mills Ltd. v. Burhanpur Tapti Mills Mazdoor Sangh.¹ This Court observed at page 456 :

".....it has been laid down by this Court that there are two general methods of fixing the terms of a gratuity scheme. It may be fixed on the basis of industry-cum-region or on the basis of units. Both systems are admissible but regard must be had to the surrounding circumstances to select the right basis. Emphasis must always be laid upon the financial position of the employer and his profit-making capacity whichever method is selected."

In *Garment Cleaning Works v. Its Workmen*² this Court observed at page 515:

".....It is one thing to hold that the gratuity scheme can, in a proper case, be framed on industry-cum-region basis, and another thing to say that industry-cum-region basis is the only basis on which gratuity scheme can be framed. In fact, in a large majority of cases gratuity schemes are drafted on the basis of the units and it has never been suggested or held that such scheme are not permissible."

The Tribunal in the award under appeal observed :

"There are * * * certain peculiar features in the textile industry in this region which militate against an industry cum-region approach. Apart from the fact that one of the four units, namely, the Ajudhia Textile Mills is a much weaker unit than the rest and has passed through a chequered career during its existence, it has to be borne in mind that two of the units namely D.C.M. and S.B.M. which are sister concerns, already have some sort of a gratuity scheme providing for two important retrieval benefits, namely death and physical disablement on a scale which is independent of wage variations and is not unsubstantial at least for categories in the lower levels."

The Tribunal further observed :

"If a common scheme is framed for the entire textile industry at Delhi, i.e. for all the four units the quantum of benefits under that scheme will naturally have to be much lower in consideration of the financial condition of the Ajudhia Textile Mill, than if a unit-wise scheme is framed. Moreover in a common "scheme of gratuity the quantum of benefits to be provided will have to be lower than the benefits already available to workmen in the D.C.M. and S.B.M. units for the most important contingencies for which gratuity benefits are meant, namely, death and retirement on account of physical or mental incapacity. Such a lowering of the quantum of benefits would not in my view be desirable as it would create legitimate discontent."

1. (1965) 1 L.L.J. 453; (1965) 2 S.C.J. 737.

In our judgment, no serious objection may be raised against the reasons set out by the Tribunal in support of the view that unit-wise approach should be adopted in the reference before it and not the region-cum-industry approach. No case is therefore made out for interference with the award made determining the rates of gratuity unit-wise.

We also agree with the Tribunal that on the terms of the reference it was incompetent to fix the age of superannuation for workmen. We are unable to hold that a gratuity scheme may be implemented only if the age of superannuation of the workmen is determined by the award. Support was sought to be derived by Counsel for the employers in support of his plea from the observations made by this Court in *Buhanpur Tapri Mills Ltd.'s case*¹, where in examining the nature of gratuity, it was observed :

“The voluntary retirement of an inefficient or old or worn out employee on on the assurance that he is to get a retiral benefit leads to the avoidance of of industrial disputes, promotes contentment among those who look for promotions, draws better kind of employees and improves the tone and morale of the industry. It is beneficial all round. It compensates the employee who as he grows old knows that some compensation for the gradual destruction of his wage-earning capacity is being built up. By inducing voluntary retirement of old and worn out workmen it confers on the employer a benefit akin to the replacing of old and worn out machinery.”

There is, in our judgment, nothing in these observations which justifies the view that a gratuity scheme cannot be effective unless it is accompanied by the fixation of the age of superannuation for the workmen in the industry.

There is another objection to the consideration of this claim made on behalf of the employers. By the express terms of reference the Tribunal is called upon to adjudicate on the question of fixation of gratuity : there is no reference either expressly or by implication to the fixation of the age of superannuation and in the absence of any reference relating to the fixation of the age of superannuation, the Tribunal was not competent to fix the age of superannuation. A gratuity scheme may, in our judgment, be implemented even without fixing the age of superannuation. The gratuity scheme in operation in the D.C.M. and S.B.M. has been effectively in operation without any age of superannuation for the workmen in the two units. An enquiry into the question of fixing the age of superannuation did not arise out of the terms of reference. No such claim was made by workmen and even in the written statement filed by the employers no direct reference was made to the fixation of the age of superannuation, nor was there any plea that before framing a gratuity scheme the Tribunal should provide for the age of superannuation. We agree with the Tribunal that fixation of the age of superannuation was not incidental to the framing of the gratuity scheme and it was neither necessary nor desirable that it should be fixed.

Counsel for the employers urged that the Tribunal committed a serious error in relating the computation of gratuity payable to the workmen on retirement on the consolidated monthly wage and not on the basic wage. “Gratuity” in its etymological sense means a gift especially for services rendered or return for favours received. For sometime in the early stages in the adjudication of industrial disputes, gratuity was treated as a gift made by the employer at his pleasure and the workmen had no right to claim it. But since then there has been a long line of precedents in which it has been ruled that a claim for gratuity is a legitimate claim which the workmen may make and which in appropriate cases may give rise to an industrial dispute.

In *Garment Cleaning Works' case*¹ it was observed that gratuity is not paid to the employees gratuitously or merely as a matter of boon. It is paid to him for the service rendered by him to the employer. The same view was expressed in *Bharatkhand Textile Mfg. Ltd.'s case*² and *Calcutta Insurance Ltd. v. Their Workmen*³. Gratuity paid to workmen is intended to help them after retirement on superannuation, death, retirement, physical incapacity, disability or otherwise. The object of providing a gratuity scheme is to provide a retiring benefit to workmen who have rendered long and unblemished service to the employer and thereby contributed to the prosperity of the employer. It is one of the 'efficiency-devices' and is considered necessary for an 'orderly and human elimination' from industry of superannuated or disabled employees who, but for such retiring benefits, would continue in employment even though they function inefficiently. It is not paid to an employee gratuitously or merely as a matter of boon; it is paid to him for long and meritorious service rendered by him to the employer.

On the findings recorded by the Tribunal all the textile units in the Delhi region are able to meet the additional financial burden, resulting from the imposition of a gratuity scheme. The D.C.M. and S.B.M. have their own schemes which enable the workmen to obtain substantial benefit on determination of employment. The B.C.M. though a weaker unit is still fairly prosperous and is able to bear the burden; so also the A.T.M.

But the important question is whether these four units should be made liable to pay gratuity computed on the consolidated wage i.e. basic wage plus the dearness allowance. The Tribunal was apparently of the view that in determining the question the definition of the word "wages" in the Industrial Dispute Act, 1947, would come to the aid of workmen. The expression "wages" as defined in section 2 (rr) of the Industrial Disputes Act means all remuneration, capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of employment, expressed or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a workman in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment, and includes, among other things, such allowances (including dearness allowance) as the workman is for the time being entitled to. But we are unable to hold that in determining the scope of an industrial reference, words used either in the claim advanced or in the order of reference made by the Government under section 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, must of necessity have the meaning they have in the Industrial Disputes Act. Merely because the expression "wages" includes dearness allowance within the meaning of the Industrial Disputes Act, the Tribunal is not obliged to base a gratuity scheme on consolidated wages.

The Tribunal has observed that the basic average wage of a workman in the textile industry in the Delhi region may be taken at Rs. 60 per month, and the dearness allowance at Rs. 100 per month, and even if full one month's basic wage is adopted as the minimum quantum of benefits to be allowed in the case of wage group with service of five years and more the scale of benefit would be very much lower than the present scale in the two contingencies provided in the Employees Benefit Fund Trust Scheme in operation in the D.C.M. and S.B.M. And observed the Tribunal:

"In view of the limitations of the terms of the reference, the quantum cannot exceed 15 days' wages for every year of service from 5 to 10 years and 21 days' wages for every year of service from 10 to 15 years. Any scheme framed within the limitations of the terms of reference on the basis of basic wage alone will therefore mean a scale of benefits much lower than even the present scheme under the Employees Benefit Fund Trust. Such a scheme cannot, therefore, be framed without causing grave injustice and acute discontent, because it will mean the deprivation of even the present scale of benefits in the case of large body of workers. In order to maintain, so far as possible, the present level of benefits I have, therefore, no alternative but to frame for these two units a scheme based on basic wage plus dearness allowance."

A scheme of gratuity based on consolidated wages was also justified in the view of the Tribunal because it "was also necessary to compensate for the ever diminishing market value of the rupee."

The Tribunal did however observe that normally gratuity is based not on the consolidated wage but on basic wage. But since 13,000 workmen out of a total of 20,000 workmen in the region would stand to lose the benefits granted to them under a voluntary scheme introduced by the D.C.M. and S.B.M. a departure from the normal pattern should be made and gratuity should be based on the consolidated monthly wage. In our judgment, the conclusion of the Tribunal cannot be supported. The primary object of industrial adjudication is, it is said, to adjust the relations between the employers and employees or between employees inter se with the object of promoting industrial peace, and a scheme which deprives workmen of what has been granted to them by the employer voluntarily would not secure industrial peace. But on that account the Tribunal was not justified in introducing a fundamental change in the concept of a benefit granted to the workmen in the textile industry all over the country by numerous schemes. The appropriate remedy is to introduce reservations protecting benefits already acquired and to frame a scheme consistent with the normal pattern prevailing in the industry.

We consider it right to observe that in adjudication of industrial disputes settled legal principles have little play: the awards made by industrial tribunals are often the result of ad hoc determination of disputed questions, and each determination forms a precedent for determination of other disputes. An attempt to search for principle from the law built up on those precedents is a futile exercise. To the Courts accustomed to apply settled principles to facts determined by the application of the judicial process, an essay into the unsurveyed expanses of the law of industrial relations with neither a compass nor a guide, but only the pillars of precedents is a disheartening experience. The Constitution has however invested this Court with power to sit in appeal over the awards of Industrial Tribunals which are, it is said, founded on the somewhat hazy background of maintenance of industrial peace, which secures the prosperity of the industry and improvement of the conditions of workmen employed in the industry, and in the absence of principles precedents may have to be adopted as guides—somewhat reluctantly to secure some reasonable degree of uniformity or harmony in the process.

But in the branch of law relating to industrial relations the temptation to be crusaders instead of adjudicators must be firmly resisted. It would not be out of place to remember the statement of the law made in a different context—but none the less appropriate here—by Douglas, J., of the Supreme Court of the United States in *United Steel Workers of America v. Enterprise Wheel and Car Corporation*¹ :

".....as arbitrator x x x does not sit to dispense his own brand of industrial justice. He may of course look for guidance from many sources, yet his award is legitimate only so long as it draws its essence from the collective bargaining agreement. When the arbitrator's words manifest an infidelity to this obligation, Courts have no choice but to refuse enforcement of the award."

We may at once state that we are not for a moment suggesting that the law of industrial relations developed in our country has proceeded on lines parallel to the direction of the law in the United States.

One of the grounds which appealed to the Tribunal in relating the rate of gratuity to the consolidated wage was the existence of a gratuity scheme in the D.C.M. & S.B.M. and the assumption that the Tribunal adjudicating a dispute is always, in exercise of its jurisdiction, limited when determining the rate of gratuity to the multiple number of days of service in the order of reference, and cannot depart therefrom. We are unable to hold that Industrial Tribunal is subject to any such restriction. Its power is to adjudicate the dispute. It cannot proceed to adjudicate disputes not referred: but when called upon to adjudicate whether a certain scheme "on the lines indicated" should be framed the basic guidance cannot be deemed to impose a limit upon its jurisdiction.

As already stated, gratuity is not in its present day concept merely a gift made by the employer in his own discretion. The workmen have in course of time acquired a right to gratuity on determination of employment, provided the employer can afford, having regard to his financial condition, to pay it. There is undoubtedly no statutory direction for payment of gratuity as it is in respect of provident fund and retrenchment compensation. The conditions for the grant of gratuity are, as observed in *Bharatkhand Textile Mfg. Co. Ltd's case*¹; (i) financial capacity of the employer; (ii) his profits making capacity; (iii) the profits earned by him in the past; (iv) the extent of his reserves; (v) the chances of his replenishing them; and (vi) the claim for capital invested by him. But these are not exhaustive and there may be other material considerations which may have to be borne in mind in determining the terms and conditions of the gratuity scheme. Existence of other retiring benefits such as provident fund and retrenchment compensation or other benefits do not destroy the claim to gratuity: its quantum may however have to be adjusted in the light of the other benefits.

We may repeat that in matters relating to the grant of gratuity and even generally in the settlement of disputes arising out of industrial relations, there are no fixed principles, on the application of which the problems arising before the Tribunal or the Courts may be determined and often precedents of cases determined ad hoc are utilised to build up claims or to resist them. It would in the circumstances be futile to attempt to reduce the grounds of the decisions given by the Industrial Tribunals, the Labour Appellate Tribunals and the High Courts to the dimensions of any recognized principle. We may briefly refer to a few of the precedents relating to the grant of gratuity. In *May and Baker (India) Ltd. v. Their Workmen*², the claim of the workmen to fix gratuity on the basis of gross salary was rejected by the Industrial Tribunal and the quantum was related to basic salary i.e., excluding dearness allowance. The view taken by the Tribunal was affirmed by this Court. In *British India Corporation v. Its Workmen*³ the existing gratuity scheme directed payment of gratuity in terms of consolidated wages. The Tribunal however modified the scheme while retaining the basis of consolidated wages which was held to be justified and reasonable. This Court observed that prima facie gratuity is awarded not by reference to consolidated wages but on basic wages and the Tribunal had made a departure from that. But in the view of the Court no interference with the scheme framed by the Tribunal was called for. In British Paints (India) Ltd. v. Its Workmen the Court followed the judgment in *May and Baker (India) Ltd.*² that it would be proper to follow the usual pattern of fixing the quantum of gratuity on basic wage excluding dearness allowances. But same principle was not adhered to in all cases. For instance in *Hindusthan Antibiotics Ltd. v. Their Workmen*¹, it was observed.

"The learned Counsel for the Company then argued that there is a flagrant violation or departure from the accepted norms in fixing the wage structure and the dearness allowance and therefore, as an exceptional case, we should set aside the award of the Tribunal and direct it to re-fix the wages."

In that case the Tribunal had awarded gratuity related to consolidated wages and without any contest the order of the Tribunal was confirmed. In *Remington Rand of India v. The Workmen*² it was contended on behalf of the employer that the Tribunal was not justified in awarding gratuity on the basis of consolidated wages and should have awarded it on the basic wages alone. In dealing with that plea this Court observed that the Tribunal was on the facts of the case justified in proceeding in that way.

It is not easy to extract any principle from these cases, as precedents they are conflicting. If the matter rested there, we could not interfere with the conclusion of the Tribunal, but the Tribunal has failed to take into account the prevailing pattern in the textile industry all over the country. The textile industry is spread over the entire country, in pockets some large others small. There are large and concentrated pockets in certain regions and smaller pockets in other regions. Except in two or three of the smaller States, textile units are to be found all over the country. It is a country-wide industry and in that industry, except in one case to be presently noticed, gratuity has never been granted on the basis of consolidated wages. Out of 39 centres in which the textile industry is located there is no centre in which gratuity payable to workmen in the textile industry pursuant to awards or settlements is based on consolidated wages. In the two principal centres, viz. Bombay and Ahmedabad, schemes for payment of gratuity to workmen in the textile industry the rates of gratuity are related to basic wages. The B.C.M. have tendered before the Tribunal a chart setting out the names of textile units in which the gratuity is paid, to the workmen on basic wages. These are—the Textile Units, Bhavnagar. (Gujarat); Shahu Chhatrapati Mills, Kolhapur (Maharashtra); Jivajirao Cotton Mills, Gwalior (Madhya Pradesh); Madhya Pradesh Mill-owners' Association, (Indore); Bombay, Ahmedabad (Gujarat); New Sherrock Spg. & Wvg. Co. Ltd., Nadiad (Gujarat); Raja Bahadur Motilal Mills, Poona (Maharashtra); Shree Gajanan Wvg. Mills, Sangli (Maharashtra); T.I.T. Bhiwani (Haryana); Jagatjeet Cotton Mills, Phagwada (Punjab); 36 Textile Mills in West Bengal; and Umed Mills (Rajasthan). It is true that the chart does not set out the gratuity schemes, if any, in all the 39 centres referred to in the Report of the First Wage Board, but the chart relates to a fairly representative segment of the industry. No evidence has been placed before the Court to prove that in determining gratuity payable under any other scheme in a textile unit the rate is related to consolidated wages. The two large centres in which the industry is concentrated are Bombay and Ahmedabad. In *Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh, Bombay v. Millowners' Association, Bombay*³, a scheme was framed by the Industrial Court, exercising power under the Bombay Industrial Relations Act XI of 1947, in which the quantum of gratuity was related to the basic wages alone. In paragraph 27 at p. 583 the Tribunal rejected the argument advanced by Counsel for the workmen that since benefits like provident fund, retrenchment compensation, State insurance scheme, are granted in terms of monthly wages, gratuity should also be related to consolidated wages. They observed that in a large majority of awards of the Labour Appellate Tribunal and Industrial Tribunals gratuity had been awarded in terms of basic wages, and that,

"The basic wages reflect the differentials between the workers more than the total wages, as dearness allowance to all operatives is paid at a flat rate varying with the cost of living index. The gratuity schemes for the supervisory and technical staff as well as for clerks are also in terms of basic wages."

They accordingly related gratuity with the average basic wage earned by the workman during the twelve months preceding death, disability, retirement, resignation or termination of service. The scheme in the Bombay region was adopted in the dispute between the Textile Labour Association and the Ahmedabad Mill Owners' Association. The award is reported in the Textile Labour Association, Ahmedabad v. Ahmedabad Millowners' Association.¹ The question whether gratuity should be fixed on the basis of consolidated wages was apparently not mooted, but it was accepted on both the sides that gratuity should be related to basic wages. An appeal against that decision in the *Ahmedabad Mill Owners' Association case*¹ was brought before this Court in Bharatkhand Textile Manufacturing Co. Ltd.'s case,² but no objection was raised to the award relating gratuity to basic wages. In the report of the General Wage Board for the Cotton Textile Industry, 1959, in paragraph 110 gratuity was directed to be given on the basis of wages plus the increases given under paragraph 106, but excluding the dearness allowance.

The only departure from the prevailing pattern to which our attention is invited was made by the Labour Appellate Tribunal in regard to the textile units in the Coimbatore Region: Rajalakshmi Mills Ltd. v Their Workmen.³ There was apparently no discussion on the question about the basis on which gratuity should be awarded. The Labour Appellate Tribunal observed:

2. "In all the appeals there is a contest by the mills on the subject of gratuity, and it is contended that the gratuity as awarded is too high. Both sides had much to say on the subject of the gratuity scheme as given by the adjudicator. During the course of the hearing we indicated to the parties the lines on which the gratuity scheme could be suitably altered to meet their respective points of view."

3. "We accordingly give the following scheme in substitution of the scheme at paragraph 85 of the award:

'All persons with more than five years and less than ten years' continuous service to their credit, on termination of their service by the company, except in cases of dismissals for misconduct involving moral turpitude, shall be paid gratuity at the rate of ten days' average rate of pay inclusive of dearness allowance for each completed year of service.'

But this award was modified later by the Industrial Tribunal in *Coimbatore District Mill Workers' Union and others v. Rajalakshmi Mills Co., Ltd.*⁴ The earlier award made in 1957 was sought to be reviewed before the industrial Tribunal. The Tribunal observed that it would be the duty of the Tribunal to modify a gratuity scheme based upon some agreement or settlement if the terms of that agreement are found to be onerous and oppressive. The Tribunal stated that the original scheme was not applicable to all the units and taking into consideration the statutory provident fund scheme and "the fact that recently basic wages and dearness allowance have leaped up", there was no justification for including the dearness allowance in any new scheme that might be framed for the new Mills; and that it would be most undesirable to have two sets of gratuity schemes in the same region with varying rates. In the view of the Tribunal there should be a uniform scheme for all the Mills, old and new, and on that ground also the retention of the dearness allowance under the old scheme must be refused.

Counsel for the workmen relied upon an award made by the Industrial Tribunal in the Chemical Unit belonging to the D.C.M. which is published in D.C.M. Chemical Works v. Its Workmen. In that case gratuity was related to consolidated wages. The unit though belonging to the D.C.M. is entirely independent of the textile unit. The Company was treating the unit as separate from the textile unit and distinct for the purpose of recruitment of labour, sale, and conditions of service for the workmen employed therein. The Chemical Unit had separate muster-rolls for its employees and transfers from one unit to the other, even where such transfers were possible, considering the utterly different kinds of business carried on in the difference units, usually took place with the consent of the employee concerned. In upholding the gratuity scheme which was based on the consolidated wages, this Court observed:

"As to the burden of the scheme, we do not think that, looking at it from a practical point of view and taking into account the fact that there are about 800 workmen in all in the concern, the burden per year would be very high, considering that the number of retirements is between three to four per centum of the total strength."

The gratuity scheme was in a chemical unit, and not in a textile unit. The judgment of this Court merely affirmed the award of the Tribunal and sets out no reasons why gratuity should be related to consolidated wages. We do not regard the affirmation by this Court of the award of the Industrial Tribunal as an effective or persuasive precedent justifying a variation from the normal pattern of gratuity schemes in operation in the textile industry all over the country.

It is clear that in the gratuity schemes operative at present to which our attention has been invited, in force in the textile industry payment of gratuity is related not to consolidated wages but to basic wages. It is true that under the scheme which is in operation in the D.C.M. and S.B.M. payment which is related to the length of service may in some cases exceed the maximum awardable under a scheme of gratuity benefit related to basic wages. That cannot be a ground for making a vital departure from the prevailing pattern in the other textile units in the country. But it may be necessary to protect the interest of the members governed by the original scheme.

Determination of gratuity is not based on any definite rules. In each case it must depend upon the prosperity of the concern, needs of the workmen and the prevailing economic conditions, examined in the light of the auxiliary benefits which the workmen may get on determination of employment. If all over the country in the textile centres payment of gratuity is related to the basic wages and not on consolidated wages any innovation in the Delhi region is likely to give rise to serious industrial disputes in other centres all over the country. The award if confirmed would not ensure industrial peace if it is likely to foment serious unrest in other centres. If maintenance of industrial peace is a governing principle of industrial adjudication, it would be wise to maintain a reasonable degree of uniformity in the diverse units all over the country and not to make a fundamental departure from the prevailing pattern. We are, therefore, of the view that the Tribunal's award granting gratuity on the basis of consolidated wage cannot be upheld. This modification will not, however, affect the existing benefits which are available under the schemes framed by the D.C.M. and S.B.M. insofar as those two units are concerned.

Mr. Ramamurthi for the workmen also contended that in the matter of relating gratuity to wages—consolidated or basic—the principle of region-wise industry should be applied and an “overall view of similar and uniform conditions in the industry in different centres” should not be adopted. It was also urged that the basic wage is very low and the class of wage to which gratuity was related played a very important part in the determination of gratuity. The basic wage is however low in all the centres and if it does not play an important part in other centres, we see no reason why it should play only in the Delhi region a decisive part so as to make vital departure from the scheme in operation in the other centres in the country. We are strongly impressed by the circumstances that acceptance of the award of the Tribunal in the present case is likely to create conditions of great instability all over the country in the textile industry. In that view, we decline to uphold the order of the Tribunal fixing gratuity on the basis of consolidated wages inclusive of dearness allowance.

We may refer to the contentions advanced by Counsel for the workmen in the two appeals filed by them. It was urged that the Tribunal was in error in denying to the workmen gratuity when employment is determined on the ground of misconduct. It was urged that it is now a rule settled by decisions of this Court that the employer is bound to pay gratuity notwithstanding termination of employment on the ground of misconduct. It may be noticed that in the *Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh's case*¹ and in the *Ahmedabad Mill Owners' Association case*² provision was expressly made denying gratuity to the workmen dismissed for misconduct. But in later cases a less rigid approach was adopted. In *Garment Cleaning Works case*³, this Court observed:

“On principle, if gratuity is earned by an employee for long and meritorious service, it is difficult to understand why the benefit thus earned by long and meritorious service should not be available to the employee even though at the end of such service he may have been found guilty of misconduct which entails his dismissal. Gratuity is not paid to the employee gratuitously or merely as a matter of boon. It is paid to him for the service rendered by him to the employer, and when it is once earned, it is difficult to understand why it should necessarily be denied to him whatever may be the nature of misconduct of his dismissal.”

In later judgments also the Courts upheld the view that denial of the right to gratuity is not justified even if employment is determined for misconduct. In *Matipur Zamindari (P) Ltd. v. Their Workmen*⁴ this Court opined that the workmen should not be wholly deprived of the benefit earned by long and meritorious service, even though at the end of such service he may be found guilty of misconduct entailing his dismissal, and therefore the condition in a gratuity scheme that no gratuity should be payable to a workman dismissed “for misconduct involving moral turpitude” should be held unjustified. The Court therefore modified the condition and directed that while paying gratuity to a workman who was dismissed for misconduct only such amount should be deducted from the gratuity due to him in respect of which the employer may have suffered loss by the misconduct of the employee.

A similar view was expressed in Remington Rand of India Ltd.'s case.¹ In *Calcutta Insurance Company Ltd.'s case*² however protest was raised against acceptance of this rule without qualification. Mitter, J. observed at page 9 that it was difficult to concur in principle with the opinion expressed in the *Garment Cleaning Works case*³. Mitter, J. observed :

"We are inclined to think that it (gratuity) is paid to a workman to ensure good conduct throughout the period he serves the employer. 'Long and meritorious service' must mean long and unbroken period of service meritorious to the end. As the period of service must be unbroken, so must the continuity of meritorious service be a condition for entitling the workman to gratuity. If a workman commits such misconduct "as causes financial loss to his employer, the employer would, under the general law, have a right of action against the employee for the loss caused, and making a provision for withholding payment of gratuity where such loss was caused to the employer does not seem to aid to the harmonious employment of labourers or workmen. Further, the misconduct may be such as to undermine the discipline in the workers—a case in which it would be extremely difficult to assess the financial loss to the employer."

"Misconduct" spreads over a wide and hazy spectrum of industrial activity the most seriously subversive conduct rendering an employee wholly unfit for employment to mere technical default are covered thereby. The Parliament enacted the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946, which by section 15 has authorised the appropriate Government to make rules to carry out the purposes of the Act and in respect of additional matters to be included in the Schedule. The Central Government has framed certain model standing rules by notification dated 18th December, 1946, called 'The Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Central Rules, 1946'. In Schedule I—Model Standing Orders—clause 14 provides :

(2) A workman may be suspended for a period not exceeding four days at a time, or dismissed without notice or any compensation in lieu of notice, if he is found to be guilty of misconduct.

(3) The following acts and omissions shall be treated as misconduct—

(a) wilful insubordination or disobedience, whether alone or in combination with others, to any lawful and reasonable order of a superior,

(b) theft, fraud or dishonesty in connection with the employer's business or property,

(c) wilful damage to or loss of employer's goods or property,

(d) taking or giving bribes or any illegal gratification,

(e) habitual absence without leave or absence without leave for more than 10 days,

(f) habitual late attendance,

(g) habitual breach of any law applicable to the establishment,

(h) riotous or disorderly behaviour during working hours at the establishment or any act subversive of discipline.

(i) habitual negligence or neglect of work,

(j) frequent repetition of any act or omission for which a fine may be imposed to a maximum of 2 per cent. of the wages in a month.

(k) striking work or inciting others to strike work in contravention of the provisions of any law, or rule having the force of law."

2. (1957) 2 L.L.J. 1 : (1967) 2 S.C.R. 596.

3. (1961) 1 L.L.J. 1 : (1962) 1 S.C.R. 711.

A bare perusal of the Schedule shows that the expression "misconduct" covers a large area of human conduct. On the one hand are the habitual late attendance, habitual negligence and neglect of works on the other hand are riotous or disorderly behaviour during working hours at the establishment or any act subversive of discipline, wilful insubordination or disobedience. Misconduct falling under several of these latter heads of misconduct may involve no direct loss or damage to the employer, but would render the functioning of the establishment impossible or extremely hazardous. For instance, assault on the Manager of an establishment may not directly involve the employer in any loss or damage which could be equated in terms of money, but it would render the working of the establishment impossible. One may also envisage several acts of misconduct not directly involving the establishment in any loss, but which are destructive of discipline and cannot be tolerated. In none of the cases cited any detailed examination of what type of misconduct would or would not involve to the employer loss capable of being compensated in terms of money was made: it was broadly stated in the cases which have come before this Court that notwithstanding dismissal for misconduct a workman will be entitled to gratuity after deducting the loss occasioned to the employer. If the cases cited do not enunciate any broad principle we think that in the application of those cases as precedents a distinction should be made between technical misconduct which leaves no trail of indiscipline, misconduct resulting in damages to the employer's property, which may be compensated by forfeiture of gratuity or part thereof, and serious misconduct which though not directly causing damage, such as acts of violence against the management or other employees or riotous or disorderly behaviour, in or near the place of employment is conducive to grave indiscipline. The first should involve no forfeiture: the second may involve forfeiture of an amount equal to the loss directly suffered by the employer in consequence of the misconduct and the third may entail forfeiture of gratuity due to the workmen. The precedents of this Court e.g., Wenger Co. v. Its Workmen,¹ Remington Rand of India Ltd. case,² and *Motipur Zamindari (P.) Ltd.'s case*³ do not compel us to hold that no misconduct however grave may be visited with forfeiture of gratuity. In our judgment, the rule set out by this Court in *Wenger & Co's case*¹ and *Motipur Zamindari (P) Ltd.'s case*³ applies only to those cases where there has been by action wilful or negligent any loss occasioned to the property of the employer and the misconduct does not involve acts of violence against the management or other employees, or riotous or disorderly behaviour in or near the place of employment. In these exceptional cases—the third class of cases—the employer may exercise the right to forfeit gratuity: to hold otherwise would be to put a premium upon conduct destructive of maintenance of discipline.

It was urged on behalf of the workmen that the minimum period of 15 years fixed for voluntary retirement is too long and it should be reduced to 10 years. In *Hume Pile Co. Ltd. v. Their Workmen*⁴ and *Hydro (Engineers) Private Ltd. v. The Workmen*⁵ the minimum period for qualifying for gratuity on voluntary retirement was fixed at 15 years. In other cases a shorter period of 10 years was adopted: *Garment Cleaning Works*⁶ *British Paints India Ltd.*⁷ *Calcutta Insurance Co. Ltd.*⁸ and Wenger & Company.¹

Counsel for the employers have accepted that qualifying length of service for voluntary retirement should be reduced to 10 years. Counsel for the employers have also accepted that having regard to all the circumstances, notwithstanding the direction given by the Tribunal and the schemes prevailing in the other parts of the country in the textile industry, the maximum gratuity should not exceed 20 months' basic wages and not 15 months' as directed by the Tribunal. Further Counsel for the D.C.M. and S.B.M. have agreed that in case of termination of employment on voluntary retirement one full month's basic wages for each completed year of service not exceeding 20 months' wages should be granted to workmen. Counsel for the B.C.M. has agreed that gratuity at the rate of 21 days' wages for each completed year of service in case of voluntary retirement or resignation after 10 years' service may be awarded as gratuity to the workmen. Counsel for the A.T.M. has shown no disinclination to fall in line with this suggestion. Counsel for the A.T.M. has also not objected to appropriate adjustments in view of the concessions made by the management of the D.C.M., S.B.M. and B.C.M.

It was urged by Counsel for the workmen that in providing that gratuity shall be paid to Badli workmen for only those years in which a workman has worked for 240 days, the Tribunal has committed an error. It was urged that a Badli workman has to register himself with the management of the textile unit and is required every day to attend the factory premises for ascertaining whether work would be provided to him, and since a Badli workman has to remain available throughout the year when the factory is open, a condition requiring that the Badli workman has worked for not less than 240 days to qualify for gratuity is unjust. We are unable to agree with that contention. If gratuity is to be paid for service rendered, it is difficult to appreciate the grounds on which it can be said that because for maintaining his name on the record of the Badli workmen, a workman is required to attend the Mills he may be deemed to have rendered service and would on that account be entitled also to claim gratuity. The direction is unexceptionable and the contention must be rejected.

It was also urged by Mr. Ramamurthi that the expression "average of the basic wage" in the definition of "wages" in clause 4 of the Schemes is likely to create complications in the implementation of the schemes. He urged that if the wages earned by a workman during a month are divided by the total number of working days, the expression "wages" will have an artificial meaning and especially where the workman is old or disabled or incapacitated from rendering service, gratuity payable to him will be substantially reduced. We do not think that there is any cause for such apprehension. The expression "average of the basic wage" can only mean the wage earned by a workman during a month divided by the number of days for which he has worked and multiplied by 26 in order to arrive at the monthly wage for the computation of gratuity payable. Counsel for the employers agree to this interpretation.

It was then urged that whereas the reference to the Industrial Tribunal was made by the Delhi Administration sometime in March 1958, the award is given effect to from 1st January, 1964, and for a period of nearly six years the workmen have been deprived of gratuity, when the delay in the disposal of the proceedings was not due to any fault or delaying tactics on the part of the workmen. The reference was made in the first week of March, 1958. The Textile Mazdoor Union then applied to be impleaded on 15th September, 1958, the D.C.M. and S.B.M. moved the High Court of Punjab at Delhi and obtained an order for stay of proceedings in writ petition filed against the order of the Tribunal impleading the Textile Mazdoor Union. That writ petition was dismissed in February 1961 and the proceedings were resumed on 12th December, 1962. Thereafter preliminary issues were decided and on 3rd December, 1963, an interim award relating to other disputes was made. It must, however, be noticed that there were four claims and the claim relating to gratuity was taken in hand by the Tribunal after disposal of the other claims. Neither party was dilatory in the prosecution of any claim before the Tribunal. It has also to be noticed that in the D.C.M. and S.B.M. there was in fact a gratuity scheme already in operation. The liability of the A.T.M. to pay gratuity arises after that unit acquired sufficient financial stability and it is not suggested that the unit had acquired financial stability before 1st January, 1964. The issue remains alive issue only in respect of the B.C.M. It is true that the gratuity scheme of the D.C.M. and S.B.M. was related only to the length of service and did not take into account the varying rates of wages received by the workmen. But the question if at all would be one of making minor adjustment in the liability of the two units to pay gratuity in the event of gratuity being payable under this award at a higher rate than the gratuity awardable under the scheme already in operation in the two units. If in respect of the A.T.M. which had no scheme of gratuity for all practical purposes becomes operative from 1st January, 1964, we do not see any reason why in respect of the B.C.M. any different rule should be provided for. Again, the Tribunal has fixed 1st January, 1964, as the date for the commencement of the schemes. Giving the schemes effect before 1st January, 1964, may rake up cases in which the workmen have left the establishments many years ago. It would not be conducive to industrial peace to allow such questions to be raised after this long delay. The question is not capable of solution on the application of any principle and must be decided on the consideration of expediency. We do not think that any ground is made out for altering the award of the Industrial Tribunal in this behalf.

It was then urged that in any event the workmen of the D.C.M. and S.B.M. should not be deprived of the right to gratuity under the scheme of the two units, if gratuity at a higher rate is payable to them under the voluntary scheme. This contention must be accepted. We direct that in respect of all workmen of the D.C.M. and S.B.M. who were employed before 1st January, 1964, and continued to remain employed till that date, gratuity at the higher of the two rates applicable to each workman when he becomes entitled to gratuity either computed under the Employees Benefit Fund Trust scheme of the D.C.M. and S.B.M., or under the terms of this award shall be paid. Workmen employed after 1st January, 1964, will be entitled to the benefit of this award alone.

Industrial disputes have given rise to considerable strife holding up development of industry and the economic welfare of the nation. Awards have been made by the Tribunals often on consideration ad hoc and based on no principle and Courts have upheld or modified those awards without enunciation of any definite or generally accepted principle. In the present case we have been largely guided by the consideration of securing a reasonable degree of uniformity in the fixation of gratuity in the textile industry, for, in our view, a departure made from the prevailing pattern in one region is likely to give rise to claims all over the country for modification of the gratuity schemes in operation, and have been accepted as fixing the basis of gratuity schemes. If, having regard to the deteriorating value of the rupee, it is thought necessary that more generous benefits should be available to the workmen by way of gratuity, the remedy lies not before the adjudicators or the Courts, but before the legislative branch of the State. In respect of the bonus, provident fund, retrenchment compensation, State Insurance Schemes as well as medical benefits, legislation has been introduced bringing a reasonable degree of certainty in the law governing the various benefits available to the workmen and we are of the view that even in respect of gratuity a reasonably uniform scheme may be evolved by the Legislatures which could prevent resort to the adjudicators in respect of this complicated matter of dispute between the employers and the employees. It may not be difficult to evolve a scheme which would meet the legitimate claims of both the employers and the employees and which might, while eliminating cause for friction, simultaneously conduce to greater certainty in the administration of the law governing industrial disputes, and secure benefits to the employers as well as the employees and conduce to the prosperity of the industry as well as of the workmen.

We propose to summarise the effect of our judgment:

(1) A unit-wise approach in framing the gratuity scheme for the four units was appropriate, and on the terms of the references the plea of the employees to fix the age of superannuation was beyond the scope of reference. The financial condition of the D.C.M., S.B.M. and B.C.M. justifies imposition of gratuity schemes as from 1st January, 1964. Even the A.T.M. which is the weakest of the four units is financially stable from the date on which the award becomes operative;

(2) The settlement between the workmen and the A.T.M. did not operate to bar the jurisdiction of the Tribunal to make the scheme of gratuity payable to the workmen of the A.T.M.;

(3) That the Tribunal was in error in relating gratuity awardable to the workmen to the consolidated wage;

(4) That the minimum period for qualifying for voluntary retirement should be reduced to 10 years and one month's basic wage in the case of D.C.M. and S.B.M. and 21 days' basic wage in the case of B.C.M. and A.T.M. for each completed year of service should be paid but not exceeding 20 months' wages in the aggregate. (This direction is made with the consent of the Advocates of the employers);

(5) That workmen dismissed or discharged from service for misconduct will not be entitled to gratuity if guilty of conduct involving acts of violence against the management or other employees, or riotous or disorderly behaviour in or near the place of employment;

(6) No modification need be made with regard to Badli workmen;

(7) The award needs no modification with regard to the date of operation of the award; and

(8) The workmen of the D.C.M. and S.B.M. who commenced service and continued to serve till 1st January, 1964, and thereafter will be entitled to elect at the time when gratuity becomes due to claim gratuity either on the scheme in force under Employees Benefit Fund Trust of the employers or under this award.

We have made some incidental changes to streamline the scheme.

On the view we have taken of the schemes, Annexure 'A' relating to the D.C.M. and S.B.M. of the award will be modified in the following respects:

In clause 1 (a) instead of "12 days' wages", the expression "20 days' wages" will be substituted;

In clause 1 (b) for the expression "15 days' wages", the expression "1 month's wages" will be substituted;

In proviso (i) to clause 1 for the expression "15 months' wages", the expression "20 months' wages" will be substituted;

In clause 2 for the expression "15 days' wages", the expression "1 month's wages" will be substituted; and for the expression "15 years' service", "10 years' service" will be substituted;

In the proviso to clause 2 for the expression "15 months' wages the expression "20 months' wages" will be substituted;

In clause 3 in the proviso for the expression "15 months' wages", the expression "20 months' wages" will be substituted;

Clause 3 will be followed by an Explanation :

" Explanation.—The expression "misconduct" means acts involving violence against the management or other employees, or riotous or disorderly behaviour in or near the place of employment.

Where the workman is guilty of conduct which involves the management in financial loss, the loss occasioned may be deducted from the gratuity payable."

In clause 4 the words "plus the dearness allowance" will be omitted.

The remaining clauses will stand unaffected except that for the words "within six months from the date of publication of this Award" the words "within six months from the date of this judgment" will be substituted.

Annexure 'B' relating to the B.C.M. and A.T.M. will be modified in the following respects:

In clause 1 a for the expression "one fourth month's wages", the expression "15 days wages" will be substituted;

In clause 1 b for the expression "one third month's wages" the expression '21 days' wages" will be substituted;

In the proviso for the expression "12 months' wages", the expression "20 months' wages" will be substituted;

In clause 2 for the words "15 years' service", the expression "10 years' service" will be substituted;

In clause 3 in the proviso for the expression "12 months' wages", the expression "20 months' wages" will be substituted and it will be followed by the Explanation of "misconduct" as in Annexure 'A'.

In clause 4 the words "plus the dearness allowance" will be omitted.

There will be no order as to costs in these appeals.

Gratuity Schemes modified.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—J.M. SHELAT AND C.A. VAIDIALINGAM, JJ.

Executive Committee of U. P. State Warehousing Corporation,

Lucknow

v.

Chandra Kiran Tyagi

.. Respondent.

Master and Servant—Agricultural Produce (Development and Warehousing) Corporations Act (XXVIII of 1956), Regulation 16 (3) and Specific relief Act (I of 1877), section 21—Dismissal of an employee in violation of Regulation 16 (3)—Effect of remedies—Contract for personal service—No declaration to enforce the same will be normally granted—Exception.

From a review of the English decisions the position emerges as follows : The law relating to master and servant is clear. A contract for personal service will not be enforced by an order for specific performance nor will it be open for a servant to refuse to accept the repudiation of a contract of service by his master and say that the contract has never been terminated. The remedy of the employee is a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal or for breach of contract. The is the normal rule. But, when a statutory status is given to an employee and there has been a violation of the provisions of the statute while terminating the services of such an employee, the latter will be eligible to get the relief of declaration that the order is null and void and that he continues to be in service, as it will not then be a mere case of a master terminating the services of a servant.

The position in law in India is that no declaration to enforce a contract of personal service will be normally granted. But there are certain well recognised exceptions to this rule and they are : To grant such a declaration in appropriate cases regarding (1) public servant, who has been dismissed from service in contravention of Article 311 ; (2) Reinstatement of a dismissed worker under Industrial law by labour or Industrial Tribunals; (3) A statutory body when it has acted in breach of a mandatory obligation, imposed by statute.

On facts, held, the regulations are made under the power reserved to the corporation under section 54 of the Act. No doubt they lay down the terms and conditions, of relationship between the Corporation and its employees. An order made in breach of the regulations would be contrary to such terms and conditions, but would not be in breach of any statutory obligation. In the instant case, a breach has been committed by the appellant of regulation 16 (3) when passing the said order of dismissal, in as much as the procedure indicated therein has not been followed. The Act does not guarantee any statutory status to the respondent, nor does it impose any obligation on the appellant in such matter. It is not in dispute that the authority who can pass an order of dismissal has passed the same : under those circumstances a violation of regulation 16 (3) can only result in the order of dismissal being held to be wrongful and, in consequence, making the appellant liable for damages. But the said order cannot be held to be one which has not terminated the service, albeit wrongfully, or which entitles the respondent to ignore it and ask for being treated as still in service.

(Held further, that there has been a violation of regulation 16 (3) in the enquiry proceedings; and that the order passed is one under Regulation 16 and not under regulation 11).

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and Decree dated the 25th October, 1966 of the Allahabad High Court in Second Appeal No. 4275 of 1965.

S. T. Desai, Senior Advocate (Naunit Lal and D. N. Misra, Advocates, with him), for Appellant.

B.R.L. Iyengar, Senior Advocate (S. K. Mehla and K. L. Mehla, Advocates, of M/s. K. L. Mehla & Co., with him), for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Vaidialingam, J.—This appeal, by Special Leave, by the defendant-appellant, is directed against the decree and judgment, dated 25th October, 1956 of the Allahabad High Court in Second Appeal No. 4275 of 1965 holding that the order, dated 10th March, 1964 passed against the respondent dismissing him from service, is null and void and that he is entitled to be reinstated with full pay and emoluments.

The respondent-plaintiff originally entered service with the appellant as a Technical Assistant in November, 1953 and later he was promoted to the post of Warehouseman on 15th October, 1959. He was confirmed in 1962 in the said post. Certain charges were framed against the respondent and pending the enquiry into those charges he was placed under suspension on 9th September, 1963. After an enquiry the respondent was found guilty and in consequence dismissed from service of the appellant by order dated 10th March, 1964. The respondent instituted Civil Suit No. 201 of 1964 challenging the order of dismissal. According to him the various allegations made against him were vague and had not been established and there has been no proper enquiry conducted against him. The enquiry, according to him was contrary to the principles of natural justice without giving him an opportunity to place his defence and it was also held in disregard of clause 16 of the Regulations framed by the appellant. He also claimed that he was entitled to the protection under Article 311 of the Constitution. On these allegations the plaintiff prayed for a declaration that the order, dated 10th March, 1964 dismissing him from service, was null and void and that he was entitled to be reinstated with full pay and other emoluments.

The appellant-defendant, in its written statement, pleaded that the enquiry into the charges levelled against the plaintiff was made properly and in compliance with the provisions of the Regulations and the plaintiff respondent had been given full opportunity to participate in the enquiry which he also did. The appellant pleaded that the respondent was not entitled to the protection of Article 311 of the Constitution. It also pleaded that the order of dismissal passed against the respondent was perfectly justified and that the suit (claim) was false and had to be dismissed with costs.

The trial Court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the protection under Article 311 of the Constitution. But it held that in conducting the enquiry, the Enquiry Officer did not comply with the provisions of sub-clause (3) of clause 16 of the Regulations framed by the appellant and that there had been a violation of the rules of natural justice. In consequence the trial Court held that the order dismissing the plaintiff was illegal; but in considering the question as to whether the plaintiff was also entitled to the further relief claimed by him, viz., of reinstatement with full pay and emoluments, the trial Court was of opinion that in view of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877 the plaintiff was not entitled to that relief. Ultimately the trial Court granted a declaration, by its judgment dated 24th March, 1965 that the order of dismissal dated 10th March, 1964 was void and ineffective and decreed the suit with costs.

The appellant challenged this decision in appeal before the Civil Judge. Mainpuri, in Civil Appeal No. 69 of 1965. The respondent filed a Memorandum of Cross Objections challenging the decree of the trial Court declining his relief for reinstatement with full pay. The learned Civil judge, by his decree and judgment dated 4th September, 1951 dismissed the appeal and allowed the Memorandum of Cross-Objections filed by the respondent. The result was that the plaintiff's suit was decreed granting both the reliefs as prayed for by him.

The appellant again challenged the decrees of both the lower Courts before the Allahabad High Court in Second Appeal No. 4275 of 1965. The High Court has by its judgment dated 25th October, 1966 dismissed the appeal. It agreed with the findings recorded by the two Subordinate Courts that the enquiry proceedings are vitiated by a violation of the principles of natural justice and also not being in accordance with Regulation No. 16 (3). Regarding the declaration for reinstatement the High Court was of the view that the rules and the Regulations framed under the Agricultural Produce (Development and Warehousing) Corporations Act, 1956 (Act XXVIII of 1956) (hereinafter called the Act) had statutory force and that as there had been a violation of Regulation No. 16 (3), the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration.

Mr. S. T. Desai, learned Counsel for the appellant Corporation raised two contentions: (1) A full and fair opportunity was given to the respondent in the enquiry held against him and there has been no violation of Regulation No. 16 (3). The finding on his point by the High Court and the Subordinate Courts is erroneous. (2) Even on the basis that the enquiry is vitiated by non-compliance with the provisions of Regulation No. 16 (3) framed by the Corporation, the relief declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to be reinstated in service with full pay should not have been granted as by doing so the Courts have departed from the normal rule that the specific performance of a contract of personal service will not be enforced. In any event, counsel urged that there are no special circumstances justifying the grant of that relief in this case.

Mr. B.R. L. Iyengar, learned Counsel for the respondent, pointed out that the findings that the enquiry held was not in accordance with Regulation No. 16 (3) and that there has been a violation of the principles of natural justice, are concurrent findings recorded by all the Courts and those findings are fully supported by the evidence on record. Regarding the second contention, Mr. Iyengar pointed out that when an order of dismissal has been passed in violation of a statutory provision—as in this case the Regulations—a declaration granted in favour of the respondent is justified.

The first contention raised by Mr. Desai relates to the question as to whether the enquiry held against the plaintiff was in accordance with sub-clause (3) of Regulation 16 of the Regulations framed by the appellant and whether the enquiry is vitiated by a violation of the principles of natural justice. All the Courts have held that the respondent is not entitled to the protection under Article 311 of the Constitution. Therefore, the only question for consideration is whether the enquiry has been properly conducted in accordance with Regulation No. 16 (3). As pointed out by Mr. Iyengar, the findings on facts on this point have been recorded concurrently by all the Courts as against the appellant.

It is now necessary to briefly refer to some of the provisions of the Act under which the appellant has been constituted and is functioning, as also the Regulations framed by the Board. The Act is one to provide for the incorporation and regulation of corporations for the purpose of development and warehousing of agricultural produce on co-operative principles and for matters connected therewith. Section 2 defines certain expressions, including 'appropriate Government', 'Board', 'Central Warehousing Corporation', 'prescribed', 'State Warehousing Corporation' and 'Warehousing Corporation'. The expression 'Board' means the National Co-operative Development and Warehousing Board established under section 3. 'State Warehousing Corporation' (the appellant is one such) means a Warehousing Corporation for a State established under section 28. Section 3 provides for the establishment by the Central Government of a Corporation by the name of National Co-operative Development and Warehousing Board. Section 17 provides for the Central Government establishing a Corporation by the name of Central Warehousing Corporation. Section 28 provides for the State Government establishing a Warehousing Corporation for the State. As pointed out earlier, the appellant is the Warehousing Corporation for the State of Uttar Pradesh, established under this section. Section 34 lays down the functions of a State Warehousing Corporation. Section 35 provides for the composition of the Executive Committee of a State Warehousing Corporation. Section 52 gives power to the appropriate Government to make rules to carry out the purposes of the Act and sub-section (2) deals with the various matters in respect of which rules may be framed without prejudice to the generality of the power contained in sub-section (1). Sub-section (3) provides that all rules made by the appropriate Government under section 52 shall, as soon as may be after they are made, be laid before both Houses of Parliament or the Legislature of the State as the case may be. Section 53 gives power to the Board to make regulations not inconsistent with the Act and the rules made thereunder, and those regulations may provide for all matters for which provision is necessary or expedient for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the Act. Apart from the generality of this power, sub-section (2) specifies the various matters regarding which regulations may be framed. Section 54 gives power to the Warehousing Corporations to make regulations not inconsistent with the Act and the rules made thereunder and those regulations may provide for all matters for which provision is necessary or expedient for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the Act. Apart from this general power, sub-section (2) enumerates the various matters in respect of which regulations can be framed. Under section 54 the appellant Corporation had framed regulations. Those regulations are the Uttar Pradesh State Warehousing Corporation Regulations, 1951 (hereinafter called the Regulations). We shall now proceed to consider the provisions of the Regulations.

Clause 1 (3) of the Regulations provides that the Regulations shall apply to all employees of the Corporation and to the personnel employed on contract in respect of all matters not regulated by the contract. Clause 2 defines the various expressions. Chapter II of the Regulations deals with the appointing authority, probation and termination of service. Regulation 11 deals with termination of service. Chapter IV deals with discipline. Sub-clause (1) of regulation 16 provides for the imposition of penalties as against an employee found guilty of the various acts mentioned therein. Sub-clause (3) of regulation 16, which is relevant for the present purpose, is as follows :—

“(3) No punishment other than that specified in sub-para (1) (a), (1) (b) or (1) (c) shall be imposed on any employee without giving him an opportunity for tendering an explanation in writing and cross-examining the witnesses against him, if any, and of producing evidence in defence :

Provided that punishment to an employee on deputation from the Central Government, a State Government or a Government Institution shall be imposed only in accordance with the procedure and rules laid down in this behalf in his parent service.”

Sub-para (1) (a), (1) (b) and (1) (c) referred to therein are the penalties of (a) fine; (b) censure; and (c) postponement or stoppage of increments or promotion. In this case as the punishment imposed is one of dismissal of the appellant should have followed the procedure indicated in sub-clause (3) of regulation 16 extracted above. Under this sub-clause, it has to be noted that an employee on whom a punishment other than that specified therein is to be imposed, has to be given an opportunity of tendering his explanation in writing and cross-examining witnesses against him, if any, and producing evidence in defence. The grievance of the respondent regarding the conduct of the enquiry, apart from other objections, is that materials collected by the Enquiry Officer behind his back were not made known to him and that information had been taken into account for holding him guilty. His further objection is that he did not get any opportunity to adduce evidence in his defence and that the various persons from whom information had been gathered by the Enquiry Officer were not tendered for cross-examination by him. It is not necessary for us to go elaborately into the various proceedings connected with the giving of the charge-sheet, the explanation offered by the appellant and the final conclusions arrived at by the Enquiry Officer on the basis of which the respondent has been dismissed from service. As pointed out by Mr. Iyengar, all the Courts have concurrently held that the enquiry is vitiated and has been held contrary to regulation 16 (3). It is enough therefore, in the circumstances, to note that the Enquiry Officer Sri F.A. Abbasi who has given evidence has admitted that he did not take in evidence in respect of any charge and that he considered the records as sufficient for giving findings on the charges. He has also admitted that he met various persons and collected information and that information has been incorporated in his enquiry report. He has further admitted that the information so collected by him was not put to the plaintiff, and has stated that he based his findings in the report against the respondent on the basis of the enquiries made by him of the police and other persons. In the face of this admission, it is idle for Mr. Desai to urge before us that the findings of the High Court and the Subordinate Courts that there has been a violation of regulation 16 (3) in the enquiry proceedings cannot be sustained. On the other hand, we are of opinion that the finding is amply justified by the evidence on record.

Mr. Desai made a feeble attempt to sustain the order, dated 10th March, 1964 as one passed under regulation 11 and not under regulation 16. We have no hesitation in rejecting this contention. Regulation 11 as we have already pointed out is in Chapter II, and deals with termination of service simpliciter and, even in such circumstances, it provides in the case of a permanent employee that his services can be terminated only after apprising the employee of the reasons therefor and asking him to furnish explanation and after consideration of the explanation and then giving the employee a final notice to show cause against the proposed termination of service. This clause in our opinion deals with a termination, other than by way of punishment, and the procedure indicated therein is quite simple. On the other hand, regulation 16 appears in Chapter IV dealing with discipline. An order of dismissal passed after following the procedure indicated therein attaches a stigma on the employee concerned. Having issued a charge-sheet and made a farce of an enquiry and then dismissed the employee after holding him guilty cannot certainly be considered to be termination of the employee's service under regulation 11. That action was taken by way of disciplinary proceedings is clear from the fact that an order suspending the respondent, pending the enquiry, was passed on 9th November, 1963. The same order further directed that the respondent will receive only subsistence allowance during the period of suspension. The order of suspension must be related to regulation 17 and the grant of subsistence allowance must be referred to regulation 18, both of which occur in Chapter IV relating to discipline. Therefore it follows that the first contention of Mr. S. T. Desai cannot be accepted.

Mr. Desai next urged that even on the basis that the order of dismissal had been passed in violation of regulation 16 (3), the decree granting a declaration for reinstatement of the respondent with full pay and emoluments is illegal as amounting to enforcing a contract of personal service. Alternatively Mr. Desai urged that in any event there are no special circumstances existing in this case justifying the grant of such a declaration.

Mr. Desai developed his contention as follows : The relationship between the appellant and the respondent is that of a master and servant. A breach of regulation 16 (3) will at the most result in the order of dismissal being wrongful. The remedy, if any, of the aggrieved party in such a case will only be a claim for damages for breach of contract. The Counsel further urged that Courts have jurisdiction to declare the decision of a statutory body given in violation of a mandatory statutory obligation relating to dismissal of a servant as ultra vires and void. Even in such circumstances, it was urged, the jurisdiction to grant a declaration which will result in continuity of service is granted only under very special circumstances which require the departure from the general rule that a contract of service will not be specifically enforced. According to the Counsel, the rules framed under section 52 of the Act by the appropriate Government may have statutory force and effect if they are of such a nature as to require mandatory compliance, but, according to him, the regulations framed by a Warehousing Corporation do not create any such statutory obligation of a mandatory nature. Hence a termination of service by an employer even in breach of conditions of service laid down by the regulations would only attract the general law of master and servant and cannot result in a declaratory decree about continuity of service being granted. In any event, the Counsel urged that a declaration should not have been granted as there are no special circumstances warranting the grant of such a relief in this case. Counsel pointed out that the respondent entered service only in November, 1958 and he has been removed from service in 1964 and it is not claimed by the respondent that he will not be able to take up service elsewhere. In short, according to Mr. Desai, the grant of the relief of declaration by way of reinstatement is erroneous.

Mr. B. R. L. Iyengar, learned Counsel for the respondent, urged that the regulations have been framed by the Warehousing Corporation under section 54. One of the matters in respect of which regulations may be framed is in regard to the conditions of service of the employees of a Warehousing Corporation. It is by virtue of that power that the regulations—called Staff regulations—have been framed. By virtue of clause (3) of regulation 1, they apply to all employees of the Corporation and to the personnel employed on contract in respect of all matters not regulated by the contract. Those regulations deal with various matters relating to the service conditions of the employees. Chapter IV deals with discipline and clause (3) of regulation 16 makes it imperative and obligatory on the Corporation to comply with those provisions before punishment other than those punishments specified therein is imposed against an employee. The regulations, according to Mr. Iyengar having been framed under the Act, have statutory effect and they impose statutory obligation of a mandatory nature on the appellant Corporation in respect of the procedure to be adopted for taking disciplinary action. On the findings recorded by all the Courts, it is clear that there has been a violation of clause (3) of regulation 16, in which case it follows that the respondent was entitled to get a declaration that the order of dismissal is void and of no effect. Counsel also pointed out that the respondent's services have been arbitrarily and mala fide terminated by the appellant and therefore there are sufficient circumstances for departing from the normal rule that a contract of personal service will not be specifically enforced.

The question as to when and under what circumstances a relief by way of declaration regarding continuity of service, after holding that an order of dismissal is void or ultra vires, can be given, has been considered both in England and here. The leading decision of the House of Lords which is generally invoked in support of the view that such a declaration can be granted is the decision in *Vine v. National Dock Labour Board*¹. This decision has also been referred to by this Court in some of its decisions, to which we shall refer presently. The case before the House of Lords in the decision referred to above arose under the following circumstances. The plaintiff was a registered dock worker employed in the reserve pool by the National Dock Labour Board under a scheme set up under the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Order, 1947. In 1948, the National Board, approved the delegation of powers to disciplinary committees set up by local boards. The plaintiff failed to obey a valid order to report for work with a company of stevedores and, in consequence, the local board instructed their disciplinary committee to hear the case. The disciplinary committee, having heard the case, gave notice in writing to the plaintiff terminating his employment. The plaintiff instituted the action claiming damages for wrongful dismissal and also prayed for a declaration that the order of dismissal was illegal, ultra vires and invalid. The Court of first instance granted both damages and declaration; but on appeal, by the National Board, the Court of appeal struck out the declaration granted to the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords against the striking out of the declaration and the National Board cross-appealed against the finding that the dismissal was invalid and also against the award of damages. The House of Lords held that the declaration granted by the trial judge was properly made as the order of dismissal was a nullity since the local board had no power to delegate its disciplinary functions. The cross-appeal filed by the National Board was dismissed. Viscount Kilmuir, L.C. in considering the question regarding the grant of declaration, observes at p. 943 that the discretion in granting a declaratory judgment should not be exercised save for good reason and then, summarising the reasons for granting the declaration, states at page 944:

"First, it follows from the fact that the plaintiff's dismissal was invalid that his name was never validly removed from the register, and he continued in the employ of the National Board. This is an entirely different situation from the ordinary master and servant case. There, if the master wrongfully dismisses the servant, either summarily or by giving insufficient notice, the employment is effectively terminated, albeit in breach of contract. Here, the removal of the plaintiff's name from the register being, in law, a nullity, he continued to have the right to be treated as a registered dock worker with all the benefits which, by statute, that status conferred on him. It is, therefore, right that, with the background of this scheme, the Court should declare his rights."

At page 948, Lord Keith of Avonholm states:

"This is not a straightforward relationship of master and servant. Normally, and apart from the intervention of statute, there would never be a nullity in terminating an ordinary contract of master and servant. Dismissal might be in breach of contract and so unlawful but could only sound in damages.

Here we are concerned with a statutory scheme of employment. . . . The scheme gives the dock worker a status. Unless registered, he is deprived of the opportunity of carrying on what may have been his lifelong employment as a dock worker, and he has a right and interest to challenge any unlawful act that interferes with this status. If the actings here complained of were a nullity, Mr. Vine (hereinafter called "the plaintiff"), in my opinion, has a clear right to have that fact declared by the Court."

It will be noted that the House of Lords, in the decision referred to above, have emphasized that orders striking off the plaintiff from the register was not considered a simple case of a master terminating the services of the servant but, on the other hand, was treated as one affecting the status of the plaintiff and whose services have been terminated by an authority which had no power to so terminate and, as such, the order was treated as void. The House of Lords have also emphasised that due to the intervention of the statute which safeguards the right of the dock worker, the order not being in accordance with the statute, must be treated as a nullity. It was under those circumstances that the House of Lords restored the decree of the Court of first instance granting a declaration regarding the continuity of service of the plaintiff therein. It must again be emphasised that the order, the validity of which was considered by the House of Lords, was treated as a nullity.

The question whether a dismissed employee can ask for a declaration that his employment had never been validly terminated, again came up for consideration in *Barber v. Manchester Hospital Board*¹. In that case a Regional Hospital Board passed an order terminating the plaintiff's employment as a medical consultant in the hospital. The plaintiff brought an action against the Board claiming declaration that his employment had never been validly determined and he also claimed damages for breach of contract or wrongful dismissal. The Court held that the plaintiff's contract with the Board was one between master and servant and the order of termination of his services could not be treated as a nullity. In this view the plaintiff's claim for a declaration that his employment had never been validly determined was not granted; but the plaintiff was awarded damages for breach of contract. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that when passing the order terminating his services the procedure indicated in clause 16 of the terms and conditions of service of hospital medical staff has not been violated by the original hospital Board and therefore the order of termination never became effective and the plaintiff continued to be still in service as the order was a nullity. On behalf of the plaintiff reliance was placed on the decision in *Vine's case*², Repelling this contention. Barry, J., observes, at p. 331:

"....I am unable to equate this case to the circumstances which were being considered by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in *Vine v. National Dock Labour Board*². There the plaintiff was working under a code which had statutory powers and clearly in those circumstances, all the Lords of appeal who dealt with the case in the House of Lords took the view that the case could not be dealt with as though it were an ordinary master and servant claim in which the rights of the parties were regulated solely by contract. Here, despite the strong statutory flavour attaching to the plaintiff's contract, I have reached the conclusion that in essence it was an ordinary contract between master and servant and nothing more."

In this view the Court finally held that the plaintiff's only remedy was to recover damages as for breach of contract.

A similar question regarding the right of a dismissed employee to get a declaration of his right to continue in employment came up for consideration before the Privy Council in *Francis v. Municipal Councillors, etc.*³. The plaintiff in that case was in the service of the Municipal Councillors of Kuala Lumpur and, by section 16 (5) of the Municipal Ordinance (Extended Application) Ordinance, 1948, the president had power to dismiss him. The plaintiff was dismissed. The Privy Council held that the plaintiff had been wrongly dismissed and that his remedy lay in a claim for damages. The plaintiff sought a further declaration that he had a right to continue in employment notwithstanding the order of dismissal. Rejecting this claim the Privy Council observed, at page 637 :

"In their Lordships' view, when there has been a purported termination of a contract of service a declaration to the effect that the contract of service still subsists will rarely be made. This is a consequence of the general principle of law that the Courts will not grant specific performance of contracts of service. Special circumstances will be required before such a declaration is made and its making will normally be in the discretion of the Court. In their Lordships' view there are no circumstances in the present case which would make it either just or proper to make such a declaration."

The Privy Council distinguished the particular circumstances that existed before the House of Lords in *Vine's case*¹ and finally held at page 638.

"In their Lordships' view the circumstances of the present case are not comparable with those in *Vine's case*¹, and are not such as to make it appropriate to give a declaratory judgment in the manner contended for on behalf of the appellant. The appellant's employment must be treated as having in fact come to an end on 1st October 1957 and the appellant's remedy lay in a claim for damages."

From a review of the English decisions, referred to above, the position emerges as follows : The law relating to master and servant is clear. A contract of personal service will not be enforced by an order for specific performance, nor will it be open for a servant to refuse to accept the repudiation of a contract of service by his master and say that the contract has never been terminated. The remedy of the employee is a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal or for breach of contract. This is the normal rule and that was applied in *Barbar's case*² and *Francis' case*³. But, when a statutory status is given to an employee and there has been a violation of the provisions of the statute while terminating the services of such an employee, the latter will be eligible to get the relief of a declaration that the order is null and void and that he continues to be in service, as it will not then be a mere case of a master terminating the services of a servant. This was the position in *Vine's case*¹.

The question has also been considered by this Court in certain decisions, to which we will immediately refer. In *Dr. S. B. Dutt v. University of Delhi*⁴, this Court had to consider the legality of an award directing that an order of dismissal was ultra vires, mala fide and of no effect and that the appellant in that case continued to be a Professor of the University. The appellant, Dr. Dutt, who was a Professor in the University of Delhi, was dismissed from service by the latter. He referred the dispute regarding his dismissal and certain other disputes to arbitration, under section 45 of the Delhi University Act. An award was made which decided that the appellant's "dismissal was ultra vires, mala fide, and has no effect on his status. He still continues to be a professor of the University". The said award was made a rule of Court by the Subordinate Judge of Delhi. The University of Delhi challenged this decision on appeal and the Punjab High Court, which ultimately heard the appeal, set aside the award on the ground that such a declaration amounted to specific enforcement of a contract of personal service forbidden by section 21 of the Specific Relief Act and therefore disclosed an error on the face of the award. On appeal, this Court, agreeing with the reasoning of the High Court observed at page 1242 :

"There is no doubt that a contract of personal service cannot be specifically enforced. Section 21, clause (b) of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, and the second illustration under this clause given in the section make it so clear that further elaboration of the point is not required. It seems to us that the present award does purport to enforce a contract of personal service when it states that the dismissal of the appellant 'has no effect on his status' and 'He still continues to be a Professor of the University'. When a decree is passed according to the award which if the award is unexceptionable, has to be done under section 17 of the Arbitration Act after it has been filed in Court, that decree will direct that the award be carried out and hence direct that the appellant be treated as still in the service of the respondent. It would then enforce a contract of personal service, for the appellant claimed to be a professor under a contract of personal service, and so offend section 21 (b)."

On behalf of the appellant, reliance was placed on the decision of the judicial Committee in *The High Commissioner for India v. I.M. Lall*¹ in support of the contention that a declaration that the appellant continued in service under the University of Delhi in spite of the order of dismissal was a declaration which the law permitted to be made and was not therefore erroneous. Dealing with this contention and referring to the decision of the judicial Committee, this Court observed at page 1244:-

"That was not a case based on a contract of personal service..... The declaration did not enforce a contract of personal service but proceeded on the basis that the dismissal could only be effected in terms of the statute and as that had not been done, it was a nullity, from which the result followed that the respondent had continued in service. All that the judicial Committee did in this case was to make a declaration of a statutory invalidity of an act, which is a thing entirely different from enforcing a contract of personal service."

Holding that "it was not the appellant's case before the arbitrator that the dismissal was ultra vires the statute or otherwise a nullity", this Court ultimately confirmed the judgment of the High Court setting aside the award.

The jurisdiction of the Courts to grant a declaration in a particular case that an order of dismissal is void and that the dismissed employee continues to remain in service, again came up for consideration before this Court in *S.R. Tewari v. District Board Agra*². In that case, the appellant's service as an Engineer under the District Board, Agra, was terminated by the latter, after giving salary for three months in lieu of notice. The appellant, after having unsuccessfully appealed against the order of termination to the State Government, initiated proceedings under Article 226 before the Allahabad High Court for a writ of certiorari for quashing the order of the District Board dismissing him from service and also sought a writ in the nature of mandamus commanding the District Board and the State of Uttar Pradesh to treat him as the lawfully appointed engineer, and not to give effect to the order terminating his service. The High Court dismissed the writ petition holding that the employee had been properly dismissed from service. The employee came up to this Court in appeal. On behalf of the District Board, the respondent therein, it was contended that the remedy of the appellant, if any, was only to institute a suit for damages for wrongful termination of employment and that he was not entitled to pray for a declaration that the termination of employment was unlawful and a consequential order for restoration in service. The decision in *Dr. Dutt's case*³, among other decisions, was relied on in support of this contention. This Court negatived that contention and stated the position in law as follows :

"Under the common law the Court will not ordinarily force an employer to retain the services of an employee whom he no longer wishes to employ. But this rule is subject to certain well recognized exceptions. It is open to the Courts in an appropriate case to declare that a public servant who is dismissed from service in contravention of Article 311 continues to remain in service, even though by so doing the State is in effect forced to continue to employ the servant whom it does not desire to employ. Similarly under the industrial law, jurisdiction of the labour and industrial tribunals to compel the employer to employ a worker, whom he does not desire to employ, is recognised. The Courts are also invested with the power to declare invalid the act of a statutory body, if by doing the act the body has acted in breach of a mandatory obligation imposed by statute, even if by making the declaration the body is compelled to do something which it does not desire to do."

cepted by the Court was that the order terminating their services was a nullity as it had not been effected in terms of the statute. In our opinion, therefore, this decision does not support the contention of the respondent.

Mr. Iyengar referred us also to the decision of this Court in *The State of Uttar Pradesh v. Babu Ram Upadhyaya*¹, but that decision need not detain us because that deals with a member of the public service who has been given protection under the Constitution. Such cases stand apart.

Mr. Iyengar referred us to a decision of a learned Single judge of the Gujarat High Court reported as *Tata Chemicals Ltd. v. Kailash*². The question that arose for consideration was regarding the validity of an order of dismissal by an employer of an employee contrary to the standing orders. The learned Judge has expressed the view that a breach of the standing orders constitutes a breach of a statutory provision and therefore the order of dismissal is a nullity. It is not necessary for us to consider the correctness of that decision because the dispute between the parties in that case arose under Industrial Law and we have already pointed out that one of the exceptions to the Common Law is under Industrial Law where Labour and Industrial Tribunals have jurisdiction to compel an employer to employ a worker whom he does not desire to employ.

Having due regard to the principles discussed above, we are of opinion that the High Court was not justified in granting the declaration that the order dated 10th March, 1964 dismissing the respondent from service is null and void and that he is entitled to be reinstated in service with full pay and other emoluments. As pointed out by us, the regulations are made under the power reserved to the Corporation under section 54 of the Act. No doubt they lay down the terms and conditions of relationship between the Corporation and its employees. An order made in breach of the regulations would be contrary to such terms and conditions, but would not be in breach of any statutory obligation, as was the position which this Court had to deal with in the *Life Insurance Corporation case*³. In the instant case, a breach has been committed by the appellant of regulation 16 (3) when passing the said order of dismissal, inasmuch as the procedure indicated therein has not been followed. The Act does not guarantee any statutory status to the respondent, nor does it impose any obligation on the appellant in such matters. As to whether the rules framed under section 52 deal with any such matters, does not arise for consideration in this case as the respondent has not placed any reliance on the rules and he has rested his case only on regulation 16 (3). It is not in dispute that, in this case, the authority who can pass an order of dismissal has passed the same. Under those circumstances a violation of regulation 16 (3), as alleged and established in this case, can only result in the order of dismissal being held to be wrongful and, in consequence, making the appellant liable for damages. But the said order cannot be held to be one which has not terminated the service, albeit wrongfully, or which entitles the respondent to ignore it and ask for being treated as still in service. We are not concerned with the question of damages, because no such claim has been made by the respondent in these proceedings.

In this view, the judgment and the decree of the High Court, in so far as they declare that the order dated 10th March, 1964, is null and void and that the respondent continues to be in the service of the appellant, are set aside and this appeal allowed, to that extent. In the circumstances of the case, there will no order as to costs.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—V. BHARGAVA AND K.S. HEGDE, JJ.

Sham Lal and others

.. Appellants*

v.

Amar Nath and others

.. Respondents.

Hindu Law—Mithakshara School—Stridhana property of a Hindu woman—Daughters of a predeceased son whether entitled to succeed.Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act (XVIII of 1937)—Applicability of.

It is now well settled that stridhana of a Hindu woman governed by Mitakshara passes in the order mentioned in Mitakshara and the children of the deceased woman do not take the same as a body either jointly or as tenants-in-common, only the heir belonging to a class take the properties as tenants-in-common.

In the matter of succession to stridhana, propinquity was not considered by the law givers as the sole or even the principal test, otherwise there is no justification for a daughter's daughter or a daughter's son to succeed to the estate of a woman in preference to her son. It is true that it is not easy to find out the reason behind the rules relating to succession to stridhana. But that is equally true of many other branches of our family laws. These contradictions are inevitable in socio-religious matters particularly when our social laws were controlled by our religious beliefs and our law givers were our religious preceptors. It is for the Legislatures to step in and bring about harmony between the society and the laws governing it. That is why our parliament enacted several statutes in 1955 to amend the Hindu law in various respects.

The expression son's son does not include son's daughter as according to the rules of interpretation the masculine includes the feminine. That rule of interpretation is inapplicable in the present case as daughters' daughter succeeds to the stridhana in preference to daughter's son. The order of succession prescribed clearly rules out the application of that rule of interpretation.

Hindu Woman's Right to Property Act, 1937, applies only to the separate property left by a Hindu male. It does not apply either to the coparcenary property or to the property of a Hindu female.

Held, Daughter's of a predeceased son of a Hindu woman are not entitled to succeed to her stridhana.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—The question of law that arises for decision in these appeals by certificate is whether the daughters of a predeceased son of a Hindu woman are entitled to succeed to her stridhana? The trial Court answered the question in the affirmative but the High Court in appeal came to the conclusion that they are not entitled to succeed to the estate in question.

The material facts of this case are few. For a proper understanding of the facts of the case, it will be convenient to have before us the admitted pedigree of the family. It is as follows:

Shri Bôol Chand

Tulsi Ram	Patu Ram	Behair Lal	Hira Lal
Mst. Barji
Amar Nath (Plaintiff)	Parhlad Rai Shri. Kishan (defendant No. 7) widow Champadevi (defendant No. 8).	Mool Chand (died issueless)	Mohan Lal (died issueless) Ram Sarup (adopted son defendant 10).	Bindrabai (died issueless)	Nathu Ram Shamlal (defendant 9 adopted).

Murari Lal (defendant No. 11 adopted).	Basant Lal Ragbbir Singh (adopted son— defendant No. 15.)	Rameshwar Dass (defendant No. 16)	Jagdish (defendant No. 17)	Nand Kishore
		Maman Chand (defendant No. 14).	Manphul Singh (defendant 12).	Sher Singh (defendant No. 13).

The finding of the trial Court that the suit properties are the stridhana properties of Barji was not contested before the High Court. In this Court at one stage a feeble attempt was made on behalf of the appellants to contest that finding. We did not permit that finding to be challenged as the same had not been challenged before the High Court. Therefore we proceed on the basis of that finding. Barji died in September, 1950. Her husband Patu Ram had predeceased her. It appears that he died sometime in 1904. Patu Ram's father Bool Chand as well as Patu Ram's brothers Tulsi Ram, Behari Lal and Hira Lal had predeceased Barji. Patu Ram and Barji had a son by some jugal Kishore who had predeceased Patu Ram leaving behind him his widow Bindri who died in 1931. They had no children. Radha Kishan, the adopted son of Patu Ram and Barji died about 20 years before the death of Barji leaving behind him his widow, defendant No. 6. Radha Kishan had five children including defendants Nos. 1 to 3 through another wife. His son Roshanlal had died a few months before the death of Barji. His daughter Balwanti had predeceased Barji leaving behind her children defendants 4 and 5. Tulsi Ram's son Prahlad Rai had also predeceased Barji leaving behind his widow defendant No. 8, and son defendant No. 7. By the time succession to the estate of Barji opened all the children of Behari Lal and Hiralal had died but some of them had children and grand children, as seen from the pedigree. After the death of Barji, her properties came to the possession of defendant No. 6. Defendant No. 1 sued for the possession of those properties on the ground that she had her sisters as preferential heirs to the deceased Barji. To that suit she did not make Amar Nath, the plaintiff in the present suit, a party. Amar Nath's application for being impleaded as a party in that suit was opposed by the 1st defendant and the said application was ultimately rejected by the Court. The dispute in that suit was referred to arbitration. The arbitrators upheld the claim of defendants Nos. 1 to 3. Thereafter the present suit was brought. In the High Court as well as in the trial Court there was a triangular contest. The plaintiff claimed that he was exclusively entitled to the suit properties, defendants Nos. 1 to 3 claimed that they are the nearest heirs to Barji; some of the other defendants contended that they succeeded to the suit properties as co-tenants with the plaintiff. In this Court all the contesting defendants sail together. As mentioned earlier, the trial Court accepted the claim of defendants Nos. 1 to 3 but the High Court held that the plaintiff was exclusively entitled to the suit properties, he being the nearest heir to the deceased. That finding is contested both by defendants Nos. 1 to 3 as well as by the other contesting defendants. That is how the aforementioned two appeals came to be filed.

In arriving at its finding the High Court relied on the rules of succession found in paragraph 147 of Mulla's principles of Hindu Law (13th Edn.). It came to the conclusion that those rules are exhaustive. On the basis of those rules, it ruled that defendants Nos. 1 to 3 were not entitled to succeed to the estate of Barji. So far as the other defendants are concerned it rejected their claim on the ground that as between the plaintiff and themselves the former is a preferential heir as he is the nearest in degree to Barji.

It is the admitted case of the parties that the properties in question are not shulka and that Barji was married in one of the approved forms. Therefore while pronouncing on the competing claims made in this case, we must be guided by the order of succession prescribed in paragraph 147, if the same is correct and exhaustive. Paragraph 147 says :

"Stridhana other than shulka passes in the following order :

- (1) unmarried daughter ;
- (2) married daughter who is unprovided for ;
- (3) married daughter who is provided for ;
- (4) daughter's daughter ;
- (5) daughter's son ;

(6) son ;

(7) son's son ;

If there be none of these, in other words, if the woman dies without leaving any issue, her stridhana, if she was married in an approved form, goes to her husband, and after him, to the husband's heirs in order of their succession to him; on failure of the husband's heirs, it goes to her blood relations in preference to the Government. But if she was married in an unapproved form, it goes to her mother, then to her father, and then to the father's heirs and then to the husband's heirs in preference to the Government."

The legal position is stated in identical terms in Mayne's treatise on Hindu Law (Eleventh Edn.—Paragraph 623, pages 744 to 746) as well as in the other text books on Hindu Law referred to at the time of the hearing. At this stage it may be mentioned that the correctness of the order of succession mentioned in paragraph 147 till we come to item No. 7 (son's son) was not challenged. The same is well settled by decided cases. It is not necessary to refer to those cases. The only contention advanced on behalf of some of the defendants is that after son's sons come son's daughters. Alternatively it was contended that the expression "son's son" includes "son's daughter." We have to see whether these contentions are well founded.

The rules relating to succession to stridhana enunciated in the text books are based on Yajnyawalkya's text "her kinsmen take it, if she die without issue." This statement is elaborated by Vijnyaneswara in Mitakshara. The relevant portions thereof as translated by H. T. Colebrooke are found in placita 8, 9, 10 and 11 in Section II of his book "Mitakshara." They read as follows :

"8. A woman's property has been thus described. The author next propounds the distribution of it : "Her kinsmen take it, if she die without issue."

9. If a woman die "without issue" that is leaving no progeny ; in other words, having no daughter, nor daughter's daughter, nor daughter's son, nor son, nor son's son ; the woman's property, as above described shall be taken by her kinsmen ; namely her husband and the rest, as will be (forthwith) explained.

10. The kinsmen have been declared generally to be competent to succeed to a woman's property. The author now distinguishes different heirs according to the diversity of the marriage ceremonies. "The property of a childless woman, married in the form denominated Brahma, or in any of the four (unblamed modes of marriage), goes to her husband : but, if she leave progeny, it will go to her (daughter's) daughters : and, in other forms of marriage (as the Asura & c.), it goes to her father (and mother, on failure of her own issue).

11. Of a woman dying without issue as before stated, and who had become a wife by any of the four modes of marriage denominated Brahma, Daiva, Arsha and Prajapatya, the (whole) property, as before described, belongs in the first place to her husband. On failure of him, it goes to his nearest kinsmen (sapindas) allied by funeral oblations. But, in the other forms of marriage called Asura, Gandharba, Racshasa and Paisacha ; the property of a childless woman goes to her parents, that is, to her father and mother. The succession devolves first (and the reason has been before explained) on the mother, who is virtually exhibited (first) in the elliptical pitrigami implying 'goes (gach 'hati ba both parents pitarau) ; that is to the mother and to the father.' On failure of them, their next of kin take the succession.

These passages have received interpretation at the hands of the judicial Committee as well as the High Courts in India and the law is now settled as to the mode of succession to stridhana under Mitakshara until we reach son's son. The controversy now is as to who should succeed to such an estate if none of the heirs mentioned in items Nos. 1 to 7 in paragraph 147 of Mulla's Hindu Law are in existence at the time of the death of the woman concerned.

Mr. A.K. Sen, learned Counsel for some of the defendants contested the correctness of Colebrooke's translation in certain respects. He wanted us to examine the original text to find out whether the translation found in placita 9 is correct? The parties did not place before us either an admitted translation of the original text or even an official translation. Colebrooke is a distinguished oriental scholar. The Judicial Committee as well as the various High Courts in this country have relied on his translation of Mitakshra in dealing with the question of inheritance. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya in his commentary on Hindu Law (2nd Edn.) deals with the order of succession under Mitakshra to stridhana in Chapter VI of that book. His translation of the relevant commentaries accords, with those made by Colebrooke. To the same effect is the opinion expressed by Justice Chandavarkar in *Bhimacharya Bin Venkappacharya v. Ramcharya Bin Bhimcharya*¹. Hence we are unable to agree with Mr. Sen that Colebrooke's translation does not bring out accurately the meaning of the relevant passages in Mitakshara. Colebrooke in his book 'Mitakshara' published in 1869 sets out the order of succession to a woman's stridhana properties at page 158 thus :

Maiden daughter	..1
Unendowed married daughter	..2
Endowed married daughter	..3
Daughter's daughter	..4
Daughter's son	..5
Son	..6
Grandson	..7
Husband	..8

If the contention of defendants is correct then son's daughter and not husband should have come after the grandson. But that is not the case.

Mr. Bishan Narain, learned Counsel for defendants Nos. 1 to 3 contended that the list given in Mitakshara is only illustrative and not exhaustive. He urged that Yajnyawalkya had stated that "a woman's property would devolve on her kinsmen if she died without issue" which means that it would devolve on her progeny which expression includes son's daughter as well. In this connection he also relied on Vijnyaneswara's commentary stating that the expression 'without issue' found in Yajnyawalkya text means "leaving no progeny." On the basis of these statements he contended that even according to Vijnyaneswara, the deceased women's progeny would take her stridhana in preference to her kinsmen including her husband. On the basis of this premise he proceeded to argue that the other words used in placita 9 viz., "having no daughter nor daughter's daughter nor daughter's son nor son nor son's son" should be understood as merely being illustrations of the word "progeny." This contention is opposed to the commentaries by Narada, Gautama and the later commentators. More than that it runs counter to the decisions rendered by the Judicial Committee and the various High Courts during the last over a century. It is now well settled that stridhana of a Hindu woman governed by Mitakshara passes in the order mentioned in Mitakshara and the children of the deceased woman do not take the same as body either jointly or as tenants in common. Only the heirs belonging to a class take the properties as tenants in common.

Mr. Bishan Narain next contended that under Mitakshra propinquity is the text of inheritance. Therefore there is no reason why the deceased woman's husband's brother's son should take the properties in preference to her son's daughter.

ters. We do not think that in the matter of succession to stridhana propinquity was considered by the law givers as the sole or even the principal test, otherwise there is no justification for a daughter's daughter or a daughter's son to succeed to the estate of a woman in preference to her son. It is true that it is not easy to find out the reason behind the rules relating to succession to stridhana. But that is equally true of many other branches of our family laws. These contradictions are inevitable in socio-religious matters particularly when our social laws were controlled by our religious beliefs and our law givers were our religious preceptors. It is for the Legislatures to step in and bring about harmony between the society and the laws governing it. That is why our Parliament enacted several statutes in 1955 to amend the Hindu Law in various respects.

We are unable to accept the contention of Mr. Bishan Narain that the expression son's son includes son's daughter as according to the rules of interpretation the masculine includes the feminine. That rule of interpretation is inapplicable in the present case as daughter's daughter succeeds to the stridhana in preference to daughter's son. The order of succession prescribed clearly rules out the application of that rule of interpretation.

Mr. Sen in support of his contention that on a true interpretation of the relevant passages in 'Mitakshra', defendants Nos. 1 to 3 are preferential heirs to deceased Barji, relied on certain passages in some of the decided cases. First he referred to the decision of the Patna High Court in *Kumar Raghuva Surendra Sahi v. Babu Lachmi Kuer*¹. Therein the dispute related to the succession to the properties left by a maiden and not by a married woman. The rules relating to the succession to the stridhana of a deceased maiden are wholly different from those relating to succession to the stridhana of a married woman. Therefore the observations made in regard to those rules have no relevance for our present purpose. He next invited our attention to certain passages in the decision of the Judicial Committee in *Bai Kesserbai v. Hunsraj Morarji and another*². Therein the dispute was between Bai Kesserbai the surviving co-widow of the deceased Bachubai's husband Koreji Haridass, Hunsraj Morarji the separated nephew of Koreji, being the son of his eldest brother, who predeceased Bachubai and Bai Moghibai, the widow of a younger brother of Koreji named Ranchordass Haridass. The question for consideration by the Judicial Committee was as to the true scope of the latter part of the placita 9 in Colebrooke's Mitakshra which says, "if a woman die without issue, that is, leaving no progeny..... the woman's property..... shall be taken by her kinsmen namely her husband and the rest as will be forthwith explained." Their Lordships observed that there can be no reasonable doubt that according to Mitakshara definition of sapinda, husband and wife are sapindas to each other and the co-widow of the husband of the deceased was the nearest sapinda of the deceased woman's husband and hence entitled to succeed to the estate in question. This decision again does not bear on the point under consideration.

Lastly Mr. Sen contended that in view of the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act (XVIII of 1937), it must be held that defendants 1 to 3 are nearer heirs to the deceased than the plaintiff. This contention was negated by the High Court on the basis of the rule laid down by this Court in *Annagouda Nathgouda Patil v. Court of Wards and another*³, wherein this Court dealing with Act II of 1929 observed:

"The question is whether the provisions of this Act can at all be invoked to determine the heirs of a Hindu female in respect of her stridhan property. The object of the Act as stated in the preamble is to alter the order in which certain heirs of a Hindu male dying intestate are entitled to succeed to his estate; and section 1 (2) expressly lays down that "the Act applies only to persons who but for the passing of this Act would have been subject to the Law of Mitakshara in respect of the provision herein enacted, and it applies to such persons in respect only of the property of males not held in coparcenary and not disposed of by will." Thus the scope of the Act is limited. It governs succession only to the separate property of a Hindu male who dies intestate. It does not alter the law as regards the devolution of any other kind of property owned by a Hindu male and does not purport to regulate succession to the property of a Hindu female at all. It is to be noted that the Act does not make these four relations statutory heirs under the Mitakshra Law under all circumstances and for all purposes; it makes them heirs only when the propositus is a male and the property in respect to which it is sought to be applied in his separate property."

3. (1952) S.C.R. 208 : (1952) S.C.J. 20 :

Similar would be the position under the Hindu Woman's Right to Property Act, 1937. Section 3 (1) of that Act which provides for the devolution of the property reads thus :

"When a Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law dies intestate leaving any property, and when a Hindu governed by any other school of Hindu Law or by customary law dies intestate leaving separate property his widow or if there is more than one widow all his widows together shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (3) be entitled in respect of property in respect of which he dies intestate to the same share as a son....."

From this provision it is clear that Hindu Woman's Right to Property Act, 1937 applies only to the separate property left by a Hindu male. It does not apply either to the coparcenary property or to the property of a Hindu female.

For the reasons mentioned above the appeals fail and they are dismissed with costs—advocates' fee one set.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), S. 123 (1)—Effect—Scope of.

The gist of the offence under sub-section (1) of section 123 of the Act is that there has to be a gift by a candidate or his agent or by any other persons with the consent of a candidate or his election agent of any gratification, to any person with the object of inducing a person to stand or not to stand as a candidate at the election. The elements required to constitute an offence are first, that the gift has to be by a candidate or his agent or by any other person. Secondly, the gift is to be with the consent of the candidate or his agent and the third important element is that the gratification is to be made with the object, directly or indirectly, of inducing a person to stand or not to stand in the election. (On facts held, that the offence under sub-section (1) of section 123 has not been made out.

The four elements in sub-section (4) are, first, that there has to be a publication by the candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of the candidate of any statement of fact. The second element is that the statement of fact is false and a candidate or his agent or any other persons either believes it to be false or does not believe to be true. Thirdly, the publication is in relation to the personal character and conduct of any candidate. Fourthly, the statement is reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of that candidates election (on facts held), that the Respondent is guilty of corrupt practice under section 123, 4, of the Act.

Appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 from the judgment and Order, dated the 19th November, 1968 of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Election Petition No. 14 of 1968.

H. L. Sibal, Senior Advocate, (Ram Sarup, S. C. Mahanta, K. C. Sharma and J. C. Tahwar, Advocates, with him), for Appellant.

Naunit Lal, Advocate, for Respondent No. 1.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ray, J.—This is an appeal against the judgment and order dated 19th November, 1968 of the High Court of Punjab and Haryana at Chandigarh dismissing the election petition of the appellant.

The appellant contested the Assembly seat from Ellenabad Constituency in the District of Hissar in the mid-term election held in May, 1968. The appellant challenged the election of Lalchand, the first respondent. The other defeated candidate in the election was the second respondent Prithvi Raj. The appellant obtained 15,485 votes. The successful candidate Lalchand secured 20,816 votes and Prithvi Raj obtained 5,276 votes. The polling was on 14th May, 1968. The results were announced on 16th May, 1968.

At the hearing of the appeal Counsel on behalf of the appellant canvassed three grounds. First, that the poster being Exhibit P.W. 11] was against the personal character of the appellant and therefore constituted a corrupt practice within the meaning of sub-section (4) of section 123 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 (hereinafter referred to as the Act). Secondly, the religious head Sat Guru Jagjit Singh of the Namdhari sect issued an appeal and a farman and thereby the provisions contained in sub-section (2) of section 123 of the Act are attracted. Thirdly, the respondent Lalchand is guilty of corrupt practice of bribery by having given Rs. 20,000 in cash to Prithvi Raj to contest the election.

I shall at the outset deal with the second and the third grounds. Counsel on behalf of the appellant pressed allegations contained in sub-paragraphs (b) and (d) of paragraph 10 of the petition which were to the effect that Sat Guru Jagjit Singh issued a farman, on or about 20th April, 1968 to the effect that it was the Guru's desire that all followers should oppose the appellant who was the son of Choudhury Devi Lal, an enemy of Namdhari Guru. Further, if any of the followers did not obey the farman they would stand ex-communicated and their 'Prasad' would not be accepted in the Gurdwaras and that they would be spiritually censured by naming them as tractors of Dharma and befallen presons in Sabha's of Namdharis. In sub-paragraph (d) of paragraph 10 of the petition it was alleged that on 21st April, 1968, the followers of Namdhari sect were called to Sant Nagar where a big Dewan of Namdharis was convened and Sat Guru Jagjit Singh made a speech there that he had taken a vow to defeat the appellant because he was the son of Choudhury Devi Lal whose family was an avowed enemy of Namdhari sect and that it should be treated as a vow by every Namdhari.

The respondent Lalchand denied that there was any meeting and further denied that there was any farman.

The appellant, it may be stated, did not adduce any documentary evidence in support of the allegations. The appellant's entire case was based on oral evidence. The appellant relied on the oral testimony of P.W. 29 and P.W. 30. P.W. 29 Ram Dayal was formerly a member of the Punjab Legislative Assembly. Ram Dayal was formerly a member of the Congress Committee.

He resigned from the Congress and contested the seat as an independent candidate against Choudhury Devi Lal and won the election in the year 1957. An election petition was filed by Choudhury Devi Lal against the witness Ram Dayal. Ram Dayal was eventually unseated as a result of the decision of this Court. The witness Ram Dayal helped the respondent Lalchand in the election of 1967 and also in the mid-term election in the month of May, 1968. The witness Ram Dayal spoke of the Sat Guru Maharaj having exhorted the Namdharis to vote for Lalchand and warned them about the consequences if they failed to do so. The witness also spoke of the meeting at Rania village on 23rd April, 1968. It is indeed strange and significant that Ram Dayal who supported respondent Lalchand and also attended meetings on his behalf came and gave evidence in favour of the appellant about the utterances of Sat Guru Jagjit Singh of the Namdhari sect. It is extremely unsafe and hazardous to rely on the uncorroborated and isolated oral testimony of such a person.

P.W. 30 Parma Nand Sharma spoke of the meeting at Sant Nagar on 21st April, 1968 and said that Guru Jagjit Singh spoke at the meeting and proclaimed that it was the duty of every Namdhari to vote for respondent Lalchand and any one who violated the said Guru's direction would be ex-communicated from the Panth. In cross-examination the witness Parma Nand Sharma said that he came to give evidence in favour of the Congress because he was summoned to appear as a witness and therefore he spoke the truth. It is obvious that when one speaks truth one does not proclaim it. It is obvious that the witness in view of his antecedents wanted to sound truthful because he came forward to give evidence in favour of the appellant.

On behalf of the appellant reliance was placed on Exhibit P.W. 24/2 to show that there was a meeting on 21st April, 1968. The appellant relied on the diary entry of Gurbhajan Singh being Exhibit P.W. 24/2 bearing the date 21st April, 1968 in support of the contention that there was intrinsic evidence in the diary entry, that there was a meeting on 21st April, 1968 where Sat Guru Jagjit Singh spoke, and the said entry is in the following terms:—

Asa Di war was recited at Sh. Jiwan Nagar. He (Sant Sahiba Singh) remained there for the whole day. He listened for some time difficulties of the Singhs who had collected there from outside, at 7 p. m. he appeared before the Sadh Sangat assembled at Muharanwali Dharamsala Santnagar and made an appeal to the audience to cast their votes in favour of Ch. Lalchand independent candidate of Ellenabad Constituency and return him as successful candidate. Then he came back to Jiwan Nagar.”

The diary entry is to the effect that the Sat Guru Jagjit Singh appeared before the Sant Nagar Assembly. The diary entry does not mention about any alleged utterance by Sat Guru Jagjit Singh at the said meeting.

Exhibits P.W. 24/1 and P.W. 24/2 are two pamphlets containing articles. Counsel for the appellant relied on the pamphlets to prove that the meeting was held where Sat Guru Jagjit Singh spoke. Both the articles were published after the election had been held on 16 May, 1968. These articles suffer from the vice of coming into existence under deliberate motive. We are unable to accept the oral evidence that there was any meeting on 21 April, 1968 as alleged by the appellant and that Sat Guru Jagjit Singh spoke at the meeting, to cast votes in favour of respondent Lalchand under threat of divine displeasure and spiritual censure.

Counsel on behalf of the appellant contended that respondent Lalchand was guilty of offences under section 123 (1) of the Act by having given Rs. 20,000 in cash to respondent Prithvi Raj to contest the election. There is no documentary evidence in support of the allegation. The oral evidence is that of P.W.

11, P.W. 12 and P.W. 13. Kanshi Ram, P.W. 11 said that he was Kumhar and there was meeting of the Kumhars on 30th March, 1968. It was decided that a Kumhar should be made a member of the Legislative Assembly. He also said that the Kumhars decided at the said meeting to put up respondent Prithvi Raj as candidate. Kanshi Ram's further evidence was that Bawa Bir Singh paid Rs. 20,000 to Prithvi Raj for election expenses. Kanshi Ram said that the payment was in the presence of respondent Lalchand. Jot Ram, P.W. 12 said that he was a Kumhar and his evidence was also that Bawa Bir Singh paid Rs. 20,000 to Prithvi Raj in the presence of Lalchand. Rawat, P.W. 13 who was also a Kumhar said that Bawa Bir Singh paid Rs. 20,000 to Prithvi Raj in the presence of Lalchand. The gist of the offence under sub-section (1) of section 123 of the Act is that there has to be a gift by a candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of a candidate or his election agent of any gratification, to any person with the object of inducing a person to stand or not to stand as a candidate at the election. The elements required to constitute an offence are first, that the gift has to be by a candidate or his agent or by any other person. Secondly, the gift is to be with the consent of the candidate or his election agent and the third important element is that the gratification is to be made with the object, directly or indirectly, of inducing a person to stand or not to stand in the election. In the present case, there is no evidence to hold that any gift was made by the candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of the candidate, namely, the respondent Lalchand. Secondly, there is no evidence that gratification was made with the object of inducing the respondent Prithvi Raj to stand or not to stand as a candidate.

Counsel on behalf of the appellant contended that respondent Lalchand was guilty of corrupt practices as mentioned in sub-section (4) of section 123 of the Act. The four elements in sub-section (4) are, first, that there has to be a publication by the candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of the candidate of any statement of fact. The second element is that the statement of fact is false and a candidate or his agent or any other person either believes it to be false or does not believe to be true. Thirdly, the publication is in relation to the personal character and conduct of any candidate. Fourthly, the statement is reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of that candidate's election.

P.W. 35, Lachhman Das was the Manager, Kwaliti Art Printers. He spoke of a poster which was printed in his Press. He identified the Exhibit P.W. 1|1 as a copy of the poster which was printed in his Press. He said that Exhibit P.W. 34|2 was a manuscript of Exhibit P.W. 1|1. He further said that the pamphlet was printed on the asking of Lalchand who was identified by the witnesses Muni Lal Azad and Jai Gopal Verma. Lachhman Das said that Muni Lal Azad and Jai Gopal Verma signed the manuscript Exhibit P.W. 34|2 in his presence. The further evidence was that 10,000 copies of the poster were printed in the said Press. It was suggested in cross-examination that the poster was printed after 14 May, 1968. P.W. 36 Jai Gopal Verma identified Exhibit P.W. 34|2 as a manuscript of the poster and further said that the witnesses identified Lalchand. Jai Gopal Verma proved his signature on Exhibit P.W. 34|2. Jai Gopal Verma said that Lalchand accompanied him to the Kwaliti Art Printers. Jai Gopal Verma further identified the signature of Muni Lal Azad. It was also suggested to Jai Gopal Verma that the poster was printed after 14th May, 1968. Muni Lal Azad, P.W. 37 said that he accompanied Jai Gopal Verma to Kwaliti Art Printers along with respondent Lalchand. He admitted his signature on Exhibit P.W. 34|2.

Counsel on behalf of the respondent Lalchand contended that Lachhman Das was neither the Printer nor the Publisher and that Lachhman Das joined the Press in the month of April, 1968. Lachhman Das was a disinterested person. He sent a copy of the poster to the Chief Electoral Officer. The letter to the Chief Electoral Officer Exhibit P.W. 34/1 was in a sealed cover. It was opened in this Court. It was proved by Muni Lal Jain, Accountant in the office of the Chief Electoral Officer. He proved that Exhibit P.W. 34/1 was the letter received from Kwaliti Art Printers on 2nd May, 1968. The witness Muni Lal Jain further proved the receipt of said letter in the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, on 2nd May, 1968. Muni Lal Jain identified the signatures of the clerks Jagmohan Saran Verma and D. N. Arora on Exhibit P.W. 34/1. Muni Lal Jain proved Exhibit P.W. 34/2 and Exhibit P.W. 34/3 which were the enclosures received along with Exhibit P.W. 34/1.

Counsel on behalf of the respondent Lalchand contended that the rubber stamp of the Chief Electoral Office bore the date 22nd May, 1968 and there was intrinsic evidence to show that the first digit 2 was smudged with carbon ink. This argument cannot be accepted because of the dominant reason that no such suggestion was made to the witness from the Electoral Office or any other witness on behalf of the appellant. If such a case had been made, the appellant would have had an opportunity of dealing with it.

Counsel on behalf of the respondent Lalchand contended that the receipt book and the bill register book of the Press were not produced. Lachhman Das, the Accountant of Kwaliti Art Printers was not asked to produce either the receipt book or the bill book. There was some dispute as to whether the signature of Lalchand on the manuscript poster Exhibit P.W. 34/2 was genuine or not. Ratan Lal Aggarwal, P.W. 58 said that the signature of the respondent Lalchand on Exhibit P.W. 34/2 was a genuine signature. The respondent's witness No. 2, A. S. Kapoor said that the signature of Lalchand on Exhibit P.W. 34/2 was not the same as the admitted signature of Lalchand and in the opinion of the witness the signature on Exhibit P.W. 34/2 was "the work of a person who was well skilled in the art of traced forgery". It is rare for two experts to agree in cases of disputed signature. The Court has to arrive at the conclusion in the light of the entire evidence. Jai Gopal Verma said that Lalchand appended his signature in his presence. That portion of the evidence of Jai Gopal Verma was not impeached in cross-examination. Lachhman Das, the Accountant of the Kwaliti Art Printers said that the pamphlet was printed at the request of Lalchand who was identified by Muni Lal Azad and Jai Gopal Verma. This portion of the evidence of Lachhman Das was also not challenged in cross-examination.

The poster on which the appellant relied is Exhibit P.W. 1/1. Exhibit P.W. 1/1 is as follows:—

"Appeal to the Voters of the Ellenabad Vidhan Sabha Constituency."

Election	(Rising Sun)	Symbol Brothers:

Just after one year election is being held. I hope I will get more support from public than before. Because you have seen the 'Adlu-Badlu' policy of Ch. Partap Singh son of Ch. Devi Dayal, Devi Lal has put up the second son as a candidate because of this fear. The deeds of Om Prakash are well known to the public. Under the auspicious of his father Ch. Devi Lal, he had been indulging in smuggling and today he is asking for votes in the name of his father. I hope the people will show the face of defeat to such an obnoxious person. My election symbol is rising sun, put stamp only on that.

Yours

Lal Chand Khod, Ellenabad Constituency".

Ganga Dhar Sharma, P.W. 31, said that a memorandum of appeal in favour of respondent Lalchand was printed. He spoke of Exhibit P.W. 34|1. The appeal which was published and distributed is Exhibit P.W. 34|2 which is the same as Exhibit P.W. 1|1. This appeal leaves no room for doubt that there were allegations against the personal character and conduct of the appellant Om Prakash who was described as "having been indulging in smuggling". In the said appeal, it was further said that the appellant was an obnoxious person.

Various witnesses, P.Ws. 14, 16, 18, 19, 21, 23, 29, 30 and 31 gave evidence of the distribution and publication of the appeal. They identified Exhibit P.W. 24|1 which is the same as Exhibit P.W. 34|2 and the evidence of distribution and publication is over-whelming.

The evidence in the present case established beyond any measure of doubt first that Exhibit P.W. 1|1 which is the same as Exhibit P.W. 34|2 was published, secondly, that Lalchand got the same printed and published, thirdly, that the statement was in relation to the personal character and conduct of the appellant, fourthly, the statement is false and fifthly, the same was calculated to prejudice the prospects of the appellant's election.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the appeal is to be accepted on the ground that respondent Lalchand is guilty of corrupt practice under section 123 (4) of the Act.

The appeal is allowed with costs throughout and the election of the respondent Lalchand is declared void.

Arbitration Act (X of 1940), section 14 (1) and Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Article 178—Making and signing of the award—Notice—Whether letter necessary—Starting point for limitation.

Section 14 (1) says that when the arbitrators or umpire have given their award, they shall sign it and shall give notice in writing to the parties of the making and signing thereof and of the amount of fees and charges payable in respect of the arbitration and of award. What will be considered as a sufficient notice in writing, of the making and signing of the award is a question of fact. 'Notice', denotes merely an intimation to the party concerned of a particular fact. One cannot limit the words "notice in writing" to only a letter. Notice may take several forms. It must, to be sufficient, be in writing and must intimate quite clearly that the award has been made and signed. To insist upon letter is to refine the law beyond the legitimate requirements. (On facts). The only omission was that there was no notice of the amount of the fees and charges payable in respect of arbitration and award. But that was not an essential part of the notice for the purpose of limitation. To emphasise the latter part as being the essential part of the notice is to make the first part depend upon the determination of the fees and charges and their inclusion in the notice. A written notice clearly intimating the parties concerned that the award had been made and signed starts limitation.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and Order dated the 8th August, 1963 of the Punjab High Court, Circuit Bench at Delhi in Civil Revision No. 330-D of 1954.

B. P. Maheshwari and S. M. Jain, Advocates, for Appellant.

Dr. V. A. Seyid Muhammad. Senior Advocate (S. P. Nayar, Advocate, with him), for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hidayatullah, C. J.—This is an appeal against a judgment and order of the Circuit Bench of the Punjab High Court at Delhi (Single Judge) in a matter arising under the Arbitration Act. By an agreement dated 28th April, 1948, the appellant company entered into a contract with the Chief Director of Purchase (Food) acting on behalf of the Government of India. It is not necessary to give the details of this contract, because the matter was referred to arbitration under an arbitration clause included in the agreement between the parties. The award was made and signed on 26th April, 1950. The Arbitrator awarded Rs. 17,080-2-9 with costs in favour of the company. The Arbitrator, however, did not send a notice as such of the making and signing of the award but sent a copy of the award signed by him to the company. The company acknowledged the receipt of this copy by two letters which are dated 5th May and 16th May, 1950. It appears that in the original which was retained in the office of the Arbitrator, it was stated that there was a covering letter giving notice of the making of the award, but the company denied that any such letter had been sent. However, nothing much turns on it as we shall show presently.

After the copy of the award was received by the company, it filed an application under section 14 (1) of the Arbitration Act in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Delhi on 30th March, 1951 for making the award rule of the Court. It may be mentioned that on 3rd July, 1951, the Arbitrator sent the original award to the Court also. Before the Subordinate Judge objection was taken by the Union of India that the application of the company to the Court was delayed since such an application under section 14 (1) of the Arbitration Act under Article 178 of the Indian Limitation Act had to be made within 90 days of the receipt of the notice intimating that the award had been made and signed. This objection prevailed with the Subordinate Judge who rejected the application. A revision application was unsuccessfully made before the High Court and it is the order on the revision application which is the subject of appeal before us.

Originally the revision application went before a learned Single Judge of the High Court. He referred the matter to a Division Bench which in its turn referred the case for decision to a Full Bench. The Full Bench gave its opinion on 17th November, 1961. Although the Full Bench discussed the matter it did not reach any conclusion in the case, because it felt that whether the application under section 14 (1) of the Arbitration Act had been made within 90 days or not, was a question of fact which has to be decided by the learned Single Judge, and as the learned Single Judge had not gone into that question, the matter had to go back to him. When the case came before the learned Single Judge, he took some evidence and examined the question in detail. He upheld the decision of the Subordinate Judge and dismissed the revision application. It has been argued before us by Mr. B. P. Maheshwari that the judgment under appeal is erroneous, because section 14 (1) of the Arbitration Act requires that there should be a notice in writing and that notice had to be something besides the award of which a copy had been sent. He has cited a number of rulings in support of his contention that a notice in writing is incumbent before limitation under Article 178 of the Limitation Act which applies to Article 14 (1) petitions can start. In chief, he relies upon Ratnawa v. Gurishiddappa Gurushantappa Magavi and others,¹ Puppla Ram du v. Nagidi Appalawami and others,² Jagdish v. Sunder,³ Ganga Ram v. Radha Kshan,⁴ Badarla Ramakrishnamma and others v. Vattikonda Lakshumbayamma and others.⁵

It is not necessary to go into the reasoning which made the learned Judges in these cases to lay down that there must be a proper notice in writing of the making of the award. That follows in fact from the words of section 14 (1) of the Arbitration Act. That section says that when the arbitrators or umpire have given their award, they shall sign it and shall give notice in writing to the parties of the making and signing thereof and of the amount of fees and charges payable in respect of the arbitration and award. What will be considered a sufficient notice in writing of the making and signing of the award is a question of fact. In the cited cases emphasis sometimes has been laid upon the latter part of the sub-section which speaks of the amount of fees and charges payable in respect of the arbitration and award. Sometimes emphasis has been placed upon the opening words namely that there should be a notice in writing. Reading the word 'notice' as we generally do, it denotes merely an intimation to the party concerned of a particular fact. It seems to us that we cannot limit the words 'notice in writing' to only a letter. Notice may take several forms. It must, to be sufficient, be in writing and must intimate quite clearly that the award has been made and signed. In the present case, a copy of the award signed by the arbitrator was sent to the company. It appears to us that the company had sufficient notice that the award had been made and signed. In fact the two letters of 5th May and 16th May to which we have referred quite clearly show that the company knew full well that the arbitrator had given the award, made it and signed it. In these circumstances to insist upon a letter which perhaps was also sent (though there is some doubt about it) is to refine the law beyond the legitimate requirements. The only question was that there was no notice of the amount of the fees and charges payable in respect of arbitration and award. But that was not an essential part of the notice for the purpose of limitation. To emphasise the latter part as being the essential part of the notice is to make the first part depend upon the determination of the fees and charges and their inclusion in the notice. A written notice clearly intimating the parties concerned that the award had been made and signed, in our opinion certainly starts limitation.

In this view of the matter we are in agreement with the decision of the learned Single Judge who has endorsed the opinion of the Subordinate Judge that limitation began to run from the receipt of the copy of the award which was signed by the Arbitration and which gave due notice to the party concerned that the award had been made and signed. That is how the party itself understood when it acknowledged the copy sent to it. Therefore, the application must be treated as being out of time and the decision of the High Court to so treat it was correct in all the circumstances of the case.

We, therefore, do not see any reason to interfere in this appeal and it is dismissed. But we make it clear that the other part of the case, namely what is to happen to the award sent by the Arbitrator himself to the Court has yet to be determined and what we say here will not affect the determination of that question. Obviously enough that matter arises under the second sub-section of section 14 and will have to be considered quite apart from the application made by the company to have the award made into rule of Court.

It was represented to us by Dr. Syed Mohammad that objections had been taken to the validity of the award and they remain still for decision. Those of course must fall to the ground with the application which we have found to be out of time. As to whether similar objections can be raised in answer to the award filed at the instance of the arbitrator is a question which we cannot go into in the present appeal and no expression of opinion must be attributed to us on that point. In the circumstances of the case we leave the parties to bear their own costs.

Jammu and Kashmir Preventive Detention Act (XIII of 1964), section 8, Proviso—Failure of detaining authority to communicate grounds of detention or inform the detenu within 10 days of detention—Detention illegal.

There is no doubt that it is the duty of the detaining authority to communicate the grounds within ten days of the date of detention if the case does not fall within the proviso. If the detaining authority neither communicates the grounds of detention nor informs the detenu under the proviso within 10 days after detention, the detention would become illegal and a subsequent order under the proviso would not have the effect of rendering the detention legal.

One is concerned with the liberty of a subject and one must adopt a construction which would not have the effect of enabling the executive to make an order under the proviso at any time after the lapse of 10 days specified in section 8. Even from the practical point of view one is unable to see that the Government would experience any difficulty in deciding within ten days whether the grounds should be served or not in the public interest. All the material is with the Government when it passes the order of detention and a period of ten days is ample for the Government to make up its mind whether the case falls within the proviso or not.

Sikri, J.—This is a joint petition by two detainees under Article 32 of the Constitution praying for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus or other appropriate writ, direction or order directing that the petitioners be released.

The petitioner, Arshad Ahmad, was detained in pursuance of Detention Order, dated 19th September, 1967, passed under section 3 (1) (a) (i) of the Jammu and Kashmir Preventive Detention Act, 1964. The copy of the order on the record shows that the order was served on the detenu by Jaswant Singh, Deputy Superintendent of Police (C.I.D.), Jammu on 27th September, 1967.

No grounds of detention were served on the detenu, but an order dated 25th October, 1967, issued by the Secretary to the Government, Home Department, was served on him informing him that it would be against the public interest to disclose the facts or the grounds of detention to him.

The learned Counsel for the petitioner, Mr. Garg, contends that the order dated 25th October, 1967, was served too late and the detention of the petitioner became illegal when the time for serving the grounds of detention had expired.

Section 8 of the Jammu and Kashmir Preventive Detention Act, 1964, provides that :

“When a person is detained in pursuance of a detention order, the authority making the order shall, as soon as may be, but not later than ten days, from the date of detention, communicate to him the grounds on which the order has been made, and shall afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order to the Government.”

But the proviso to section 8 states :

“Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall apply to the case of any person detained with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the security of the State, if the authority making the order, by the same or a subsequent order, directs that the person detained may be informed that it would be against public interest to communicate to him the grounds on which the detention order has been made.”

The learned Counsel for the State contends that if an order has been made under the proviso it does not matter whether the order is made and served beyond the ten days' time specified in section 8.

We are unable to accept this contention. There is no doubt that it is the duty of the detaining authority to communicate the grounds within ten days of the date of detention if the case does not fall within the proviso. If the detaining authority neither communicates the grounds of detention nor informs the detenu under the proviso within 10 days of the detention, the detention would become illegal and a subsequent order under the proviso would not have the effect of rendering the detention legal.

A similar point arose before this Court in *Abdul Jabbar Butt v. State of Jammu and Kashmir*¹. This Court was then considering the Jammu and Kashmir Preventive Detention Act (IV of Sambat 2011) and similar provisions contained therein. Das, C.J., observed:

“If the grounds are not communicated to the detenu within the period of time prescribed by the expression ‘as soon as may be’ the detenu becomes deprived of his statutory right under sub-section (1) and his detention in such circumstances becomes illegal as being otherwise than in accordance with procedure prescribed by law. In order to prevent this result in certain specified cases the proviso authorises the Government to issue the requisite declaration so as to exclude entirely the operation of sub-section (1). It, therefore, stands to reason and is consistent with the principle of harmonious construction of statutes that the power of issuing a declaration so as to prevent the unwanted result of the operation of sub-section (1) should be exercised before that very result sets in."

Although there is some change in the language in the present act in substance the provisions are similar as far as the present point is concerned. We are here concerned with the liberty of a subject and we must adopt a construction which would not have the effect of enabling the executive to make an order under the proviso at any time after the lapse of ten days specified in section 8. Even from the practical point of view we are unable to see that the Government would experience any difficulty in deciding within ten days whether the grounds should be served or not in the public interest. All the material is with the Government when it passes the order of detention and a period of ten days is ample for the Government to make up its mind whether the case falls within the proviso or not.

In the result we hold that the detention of the petitioner Arshad Ahmad is illegal and he should be released.

Coming to the case of the second petitioner Fazal Hussain, he was detained by Order dated 3rd January, 1968, passed under section 3 (1) read with section 5 of the Jammu and Kashmir Preventive Detention Act, 1964. The order of detention was served on the petitioner in the Central Jail on 8th January, 1968, and the same was read out to him. By order dated 11th January, 1968, the petitioner was informed that it was against public interest to disclose facts or to communicate to him the grounds on which the detention order was passed. The affidavit stating these facts in shown to by the Additional Secretary to the Government, Jammu and Kashmir, Home Department, and it is stated in the verification that these facts were stated on the basis of information derived from the record of the case which he believed to be true.

The learned Counsel for the petitioner contends that the Deputy Superintendent, Central Jail, who is alleged to have served the order of detention on the petitioner should have filed the affidavit. The State has annexed to the affidavit a copy of the Government Detention Order and below the detention order the following endorsement exists:

"The notice of this order has been served upon Shri Fazal Hussain, s/o. Ayub Khan detenu by reading over the same to him.

(Sd.) Dy. Superintendent,
Central Jail, Jammu 8/1".

In view of this endorsement existing on the order of detention we do not consider that it was necessary that the Deputy Superintendent, Central Jail, should have filed an affidavit to the effect that he had served the order of detention on the detenu Fazal Hussain.

No other point is raised. The petition of Fazal Hussain accordingly fails and is dismissed.

Order accordingly.

THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—K. S. HEGDE AND A. N. RAY, JJ.

B. P. Maurya

v.

Prakash Vir Shastri and others

... Respondents.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), section 123 (4)—Scope—Act intended to protect freedom of speech and also to restrain malicious propaganda—Personal character and conduct of the candidate—Sub-section (4) contravened when any false allegation of fact pierces the politician and touches the person of the candidate.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), section 123 (3-A)—Scope—Promotion of, or attempt to promote, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of citizens of India on grounds of religion, race, caste, community or language made a corrupt practice—Such promotion or attempt to promote enmity or hatred also to be for the furtherance of the election of the candidate or for prejudicially affecting the election of any candidate—Personal character or conduct, meaning of.

The appellant challenged the election of the first respondent on grounds of corrupt practices as mentioned in sub-sections (2), (3), (3-A) and (4) of section 123 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951. The various corrupt practices on which the appellant relied relate to occurrences at six places. The first question was whether a meeting was held at Hapur Town Hall Maidan on 7th February, 1967. Neither the Vir Arjun news item dated 7th February, 1967, nor the news item appearing under the date 7th February, 1967, Hapur published in the Hindustan on 8th February, 1967, contains any intrinsic evidence that a meeting was held at Hapur on 7th February, 1967. With regard to the said meeting the oral evidence on behalf of the appellant is that the meeting was held and oral evidence on behalf of the respondent is that the meeting was not held. In the case of conflicting oral testimony it is safer to place reliance on documentary evidence. The newspaper report on which the appellant relies contained intrinsic evidence which totally nullifies the appellant's case. Again the General Diary of Thana Hapur bearing the date 7th February, 1967, shows that a constable was sent to the Town Hall Maidan to make arrangements in connection with the meeting which was addressed by one Kailash Prakash on behalf of the Congress candidate. It is highly improbable that two meetings of the two rival candidates, namely of the Congress and of the respondent (an Independent candidate) would both be held on the same date and at the same place. The First Information Report dated 7th February, 1967, about the attack on the office of the Republican Party by the supporters of the respondent, is significantly silent about any meeting having been held on 7th February, 1967, at Hapur Town Hall Maidan. The attack on the party office was not proved by the appellant to have been made by respondent's workers and supporters. Therefore, it is clear that no meeting was held at Hapur on 7th February, 1967, and that there was no attack on the office of the Republican Party.

Secondly, the appellant alleged that the Jatav voters were not allowed to vote and that was denied by the respondent. The oral evidence on behalf of the appellant was not acceptable for two reasons. First, if there had been any incident of a voter being prevented from voting a complaint would have been made to the polling officer of the polling station. Secondly, Vireshwar Tyagi and Mahendra Singh Verma who were the supporters of the appellant and who are alleged to have said that voters at Nagola were prevented from voting did not lodge any report about the alleged corrupt practice particularly when it was said to be committed by the first respondent himself.

On the question of assault on Shamshad Elahi, considering the injury report along with the statement of Shamshad Elahi and the report of the appellant and the complaint of Shamshad Elahi, it becomes clear that there was no complaint about injuries after the injury report and there is also no evidence that the assault was by the workers of the first respondent.

The allegations that on 2nd February, 1967, an election meeting was organised in support of the candidature of the appellant and the supporters of the first respondent created disturbance with the result that the meeting could not be continued and the supporters of the first respondent chased the appellant, cannot be accepted because, first, there was no complaint by the appellant to the Election Commissioner, secondly, there was no police case and no investigation, thirdly the reports did not mention the name of the appellant as having been assaulted or chased and fourthly, the news item in the Patriot was not proved as to the truth of the contents therein.

All the three allegations about the voters having been stopped from casting their franchise followed the same pattern of oral evidence. The absence of any report either to the Election Commission or to the Police authorities is an important and noticeable feature and therefore the oral evidence is not acceptable.

It was said by the appellant that the first respondent promoted feelings of enmity or hatred against the appellant and further raised Communal Propaganda. He also relied on Exhibit 22, being the editorial in Vir Arjun dated 7th February, 1967. Annexure MM was said by the appellant to be a communal propaganda. Annexure MM was not proved. Even if it were proved the slogans do not offend the provisions of either sub-section (3-A) or sub-section (4) of section 123. The statements of Exhibit 22 do not make any reflection on the moral or mental nature of the appellant and they do not touch the personal character of the appellant, nor do they promote enmity or hatred on grounds of religion.

Appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 from the Judgment and Order dated the 12th April, 1968 of the Allahabad High Court in Election Petition No. 19 of 1967.

Appellant in person.

L. M. Singvi and Veda Vvasa. Senior Advocates (Rishi Ram, Bishambhar Lal, K. C. Sharma, H. K. Puri, U. P. Singh and K. K. Jain. Advocates, with them), for Respondents No. 1.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ray, J.—This is an appeal against the judgment and order of the High Court at Allahabad, dated 12th April, 1968, dismissing the election petition filed by the appellant.

The appellant contested the General Election to the Lok Sabha from Hapur Parliamentary Constituency in the year 1967. There were seven rival candidates numbered respondents 1 to 7. The appellant contested the election on the ticket of the Republican Party. He was then a sitting member of Parliament. Among the rival candidates, Prakash Vir Shastri was an independent candidate. The election symbol of the appellant was elephant and the election symbol of Prakash Vir Shastri was lion. Prakash Vir Shastri secured 1,49,943 votes while the appellant secured 1,01,875 votes. The Swatantra candidate Sri Naseem secured 34,274 votes. The Congress candidate respondent Smt. Kamla Chaudhury secured 33,988 votes. The appellant challenged the election on grounds of corrupt practices as mentioned in sub-sections (2), (3) and (4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 (hereinafter referred to as the Act).

At the hearing of the appeal the appellant appeared in person after Counsel on his behalf had obtained leave of this Court to withdraw and to allow the appellant to appear in person.

The various corrupt practices on which the appellant relied relate to occurrences at six places. The appellant did not press the other occurrences. The first occurrence relates to a meeting held at the Town Hall Maidan at Hapur on 7th February, 1967. The appellant alleged that the Hapur meeting respondent Prakash Vir Shastri and his supporters delivered inflammatory speeches against the appellant and thereafter the said respondent Shastri's supporters entered the office of the Republican Party, to which the appellant belonged, assaulted the workers of the appellant, tore posters, abused the appellant and threatened his workers. In support of the allegations the appellant relied on Exhibit-28 the news report in the 'Hindustan' published on 8th February, 1967 and also on Exhibit-23 the news report in the newspaper named 'Vir Arjun' published on 8th February, 1967 and Exhibit-22 being the editorial in the Vir Arjun published on 7th February, 1967. The newspaper report in the 'Hindustan' Exhibit-28 published on 8th February, 1967, contains the note of the correspondent from Hapur bearing the date 7th February, 1967, stating that a big meeting was held in support of respondent Shastri, Lok Sabha candidate from Hapur-Ghaziabad Constituency. In the 'Vir Arjun' dated 8th February, 1967, Exhibit-23, it is stated that the supporters of the Republican Party were raising slogans that they were championing the cause of Harijans and Muslim youths from Aligarh University were brought for that purpose. It was also stated in the said newspaper that Muslim students of Aligarh were raising the slogans 'Harijan Muslim are brothers and where from Hindu community has come. Black face be of a Brahmin, barber and lala. Throw shoes on Bhat, Gujar and Rajput'. The appellant in paragraph 11 of the petition further alleged that respondent Shastri was associated with the 'Vir Arjun' and K. Narendra, Editor of Vir Arjun who was a colleague of respondent Shastri wrote an editorial by way of an appeal to support the candidature of respondent Shastri in that newspaper on 7th February, 1967, Exhibit-22 and the said appeal was also an instance of corrupt practice. The further allegations in the petition were that at the meeting which was held at the Town Hall Maidan at Hapur on 7th February, 1967, respondent Shastri and the said K. Narendra, Editor of Vir Arjun delivered inflammatory speeches.

The appellant generally impeached the judgment of the High Court on two grounds. First, that there was no discussion of the entire evidence and, secondly, that there was rejection of the evidence on behalf of the appellant on consideration that the appellant's witnesses belonged to particular castes and sects.

The criticism on behalf of the appellant with regard to Hapur meeting was that respondent Shastri in answer to the petition did not state that there was a meeting on 6th February, 1967 and thereby the appellant was denied the opportunity of meeting that case. The appellant relied on the decision of this Court in *Badat & Company v. E. I. Trading*¹ and the observations appearing at page 547 of the report in support of the contention that under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and, in particular the provisions contained in Order VIII of the Code, respondent Shastri should have alleged in the pleadings that the meeting was held on 6th February, 1967 and in the absence of such allegations respondent Shastri should not have been allowed to make that case. The decision of this Court is of no aid to the appellant. In the case of *Badat & Company*¹ the question was whether there was a contract between the parties and it was alleged by the plaintiff with reference to two letters that the letters would indicate some of the terms of the transaction. The defendant in the written statement did not specifically deny the said two letters. This Court observed that a mere denial of the contract was not sufficient and the rules of the Code enjoined denial of the existence of the letters. In the present case, the question was whether a meeting was held at Hapur Town Hall Maidan on 7th February, 1967. The respondent denied such a meeting. The respondent was not called upon to state as to whether there was a meeting on 6th February, 1967.

The news item in the newspaper 'Hindustan' Exhibit 28 gave news from Hapur under the date 7th February, 1967, that a meeting was held at Hapur. Exhibit-23 was a news item in the newspaper 'Vir Arjun' under the date 7th February, 1967, that Shri Narendra, Editor of Vir Arjun spoke at an election meeting at Hapur. Neither the Vir Arjun news item dated 7th February, 1967, nor the news item appearing under the date 7th February, 1967, Hapur published in the Hindustan on 8th February, 1967 contains any intrinsic evidence that a meeting was held at Hapur on 7th February, 1967.

Further, of the witnesses on behalf of the appellant P.W. 25 Bal Kishan spoke of the meeting at the Hapur Town Hall Maidan on 7th February, 1967 and he also stated that three pamphlets were distributed and two issues of newspapers were also distributed, namely, the Vir Arjun and Pratap. No such pamphlet was produced. The two witnesses on behalf of respondent Shastri, Bhagwati Prasad Jain D.W. 16 and Rameshwar Prasad Goel D.W. 18 said that a Congress election meeting was held at the Town Hall Maidan, Hapur and no election meeting was held in support of respondent Shastri at the Town Hall Maidan, Hapur on 7th February, 1967.

With regard to the meeting at the Town Hall Maidan at Hapur alleged by the appellant to have been held on 7th February, 1967, the oral evidence on behalf of the appellant is that the meeting was held and the oral evidence on behalf of the respondent is that the meeting was not held. In the case of conflicting oral testimony it is safer to place reliance on documentary evidence. First, the newspaper report on which the appellant relies contained intrinsic evidence which totally nullifies the appellant's case. Exhibit 28 being the 'Hindustan' dated 8th February, 1967, indicates the news about Hapur under the date 7th February, 1967, that a meeting was held "yesterday night" meaning thereby 6th February, 1967, in support of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri. Secondly, the newspaper 'Vir Arjun' published on 8th February, 1967, gave the news at Hapur under the date 7th February, 1967. The news referred to an election meeting at Hapur but did not mention that the meeting was held on 7th February or on 6th February, 1967. Thirdly, Exhibit A-12 which is an application by one Lakhi Ram seeking permission from the Municipal Board for holding a meeting on 7th February, 1967, in the Town Hall Maidan, Hapur throws light on this aspect. The permission given by the authorities which is marked Exhibit A-13 required the persons holding the meeting to pay certain charges towards the use of the electricity. Exhibit A-14 is a receipt for payment of Rs. 5. These three documents indicate that the meeting which was held on 7th February, 1967, was a meeting organised by the supporters of the Congress Party. Fourthly, Exhibit A-2 which is a General Diary of Thana Hapur bearing the date 7th February, 1967, shows that a constable was sent to the Town Hall Maidan to make arrangements in connection with the meeting which was to be addressed by one Kailash Prakash. The witnesses on behalf of the respondent Shastri mentioned the name of Kailash Prakash and Smt. Kamla Chaudhury as speakers on behalf of the Congress candidate. It is highly improbable that two meetings of the two rival candidates, namely of the Congress and of the respondent Prakash Vir Shastri would both be held on the same date and at the same place. Fifthly, the reports which were lodged by the supporters of the appellant with regard to the attack on the office of the Republican Party on 7th February, 1967, do not mention or refer at all to any meeting on behalf of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri on 7th February, 1967, at the Town Hall Maidan, Hapur. It would be natural if a meeting had been held on 7th February, 1967, that there would have been reference to the same.

The other allegations of the appellant were that respondent Shastri's supporters on 7th February, 1967, attacked the office of the Republican Party, to which the appellant belonged. There was the First Information Report dated 7th February, 1967, about the attack on the office of the Republican Party. The report is significantly silent about any meeting having been held on 7th February, 1967, at Hapur Town Hall Maidan. Though there was the alleged complaint about the attack on the office of the Republican Party, it appears that there was no investigation. The attack on the party office was not proved by the appellant to have been made by respondent Shastri's workers and supporters. The High Court correctly came to the conclusion that no meeting was held at Hapur on 7th February, 1967 and there was no attack on the office of the Republican Party.

With regard to the attack on the office of the Republican Party to which the appellant belonged though the first information report gave the news about the attack it is strange that there was no investigation. The report of the Joint Secretary of the Republican Party to the President of the Republican Party bearing the date 8th February, 1967, alleged that the supporters of Prakash Vir Shastri attacked the office of the Republican Party on 7th February, 1967, forcibly took necessary papers and a flag of the Party. Dal Chand Nimesh, Joint Secretary of the Republican Party, P.W. 71 in his evidence stated that none of the processionists went to his office and further he did himself in an adjoining room. He did not prove the truth of the statements contained in his report which was marked as Exhibit 11. The attack on the office of the Republican Party was not mentioned at all either in the Vir Arjun of 8th February, 1967, or in the Hindustan dated 8th February, 1967. It is obvious that if in fact any attack had been made on the office of the Republican Party, the supporters of the appellant would have taken steps for investigation and publication.

The second occurrence on which the appellant relied is alleged to have happened at a place called Nagola. The appellant's case was that on 18th February, 1967, Prakash Vir Shastri and his supporters who were mostly Tyagi by caste asked the Tyagis to stop the Jatav voters from going to the polling station to cast their votes. It was alleged that Thawariya made the announcement by beat of drums that the Muslim, Chamar, Bhari and Jatav voters would not be allowed to go to the polling station to cast their votes. The other part of the appellant's case about the Nagola incident was that there was an assault on Shamshad Elahi, a worker of the appellant. The appellant relied on the oral testimony of P.W. 11, P.W. 12, P.W. 15, P.W. 16, P.W. 17, P.W. 19, P.W. 23, P.W. 65 and P.W. 80. The witnesses on behalf of the respondent were D.W. 4, D.W. 12, D.W. 13, D.W. 30 and D.W. 33. The oral evidence is in support of the rival contentions, namely, that the Jatav voters would not be allowed to vote and the denial of the same by the respondent. The appellant also relied on Exhibit N that the Jatav voters would not be allowed to cast their votes by the Tyagis.

In support of the case with regard to assault on Shamshad Elahi the appellant relied on the oral evidence of Shamshad Elahi, P.W. 11 and the injury report Exhibit 30 and other documents, namely, Exhibits 31, 32 and 35. The appellant criticised the judgment by contending that there was no discussion of the oral evidence of P.W. 17, Satya Pal Malik, P.W. 11, Shamshad Elahi said that he went to Nagola at about 3.30 P.M. on 19th February, 1967, the date of the election and the voters told him about the proclamation by beat of drums on the previous night and the voters further said that they would be insulted and they should remain there. Shamshad Elahi further said that he met Sevak Ram and Surajbhan Tyagi and 10 or 12 other persons were with them and they beat the witness with lathis and he received a number of injuries.

The other witnesses on whose testimony the appellant relied said that people wearing lion badges which was the election symbol of Prakash Vir Shastri asked the witnesses not to cast their votes and they also said that it was announced by beat of drums that no Chamar or Bhangi should cast a vote.

Nagola is a village within the circle of Badhnauli. R. K. Aggarwal, D.W. 33 who was the Presiding Officer at Badhnauli polling station gave evidence. He said that the votes of village Nagola were polled and no Harijan or Mohammedan voter was stopped from casting votes and that there was no complaint that Harijan and Mohammedan voters were being stopped from casting their votes. In cross-examination the witness said that no voters from Haider-nagar or Nagola were brought to the polling station under police protection.

P.W. 80, Sukhbir Singh who was posted as Station Officer Thana Kharkoda said that he received information from Shamshad Elahi that voters at Badhnauli were being stopped from casting their votes. Sukhbir Singh went to Badhnauli. He also went to Nagola. He said that 30 or 40 Harijan voters went to Badhnauli to cast their votes. He said that there was no voter who was taken by him to a polling station in a truck. Sukhbir Singh proved Exhibit 35 which was a contemporaneous report to the effect that no one was stopped from voting at Nagola.

Satya Pal Malik on whose testimony the appellant relied said that Prakash Vir Shastri came to Badhnauli polling station on 19th February, 1967 and there were 40 to 50 persons around him with lion badges on. His further evidence was that Prakash Vir Shastri asked the Pradhan to beat the voters to make them run away. Prakash Vir Shastri however denied having asked Sheoraj Singh Pradhan to drive away the voters.

Thanwaria, P.W. 23 on whose evidence the appellant relied said that he beat the drum in Nagola village on a day before the polling. He said that there were two parties of the Tyagis. One was of Sheoraj Singh and the other was of Pyare Lal. The Jatavs, according to his testimony, were in Pyare Lal's party and the Bhangis were in Sheoraj's party. The appellant said that Thanwaria was disbelieved only because he belonged to the Chamar caste. That is misreading the judgment. The High Court said that the evidence of Thanwaria did not inspire confidence. That criticism of the evidence of Thanwaria is justified because he came to support the case of the appellant and he belonged to the appellant's camp.

Pyare Lal, D.W. 12 said that no Harijan was stopped from casting his vote at Badhnauli polling station and no worker of Prakash Vir Shastri threatened any Harijan voter at the polling station. The appellant criticised the evidence of Pyare Lal that he did not know as to what was happening in the village. Satya Pal Malik, P.W. 17 mentioned the name of Pyare Lal as the leader of one of the parties and Sheoraj Singh as Pradhan of the village Nagola.

The oral evidence on behalf of the appellant is not acceptable for two reasons. First, if there had been any incident of a voter being prevented from voting a complaint would have been made to the polling officer of the polling station.

Secondly, Vireshwar Tyagi and Mahendra Singh Verma, who were the supporters of the appellant and who are alleged to have said that voters at Nagola were prevented from voting did not lodge any report about the alleged corrupt practice particularly when it was said to be committed by Prakash Vir Shastri himself.

The assault on Shamshad Elahi which was also said to be an incident of corrupt practice is unacceptable for these reasons. First, the injury report Exhibit-30 has to be considered along with the statement of Shamshad Elahi being Annexure M and the report of the appellant being Exhibit-32 and the complaint of Shamshad Elahi being Annexure N being Exhibit-30. The appellant in the report dated 17th February, 1967 Exhibit-32 spoke of voters not being allowed to exercise their votes. Shamshad Elahi in his complaint said that 10 or 12 persons beat him with lathis. All this happened on 19th February, 1967. The doctor's report was about the injuries. First, it is peculiar that there was no complaint about the injuries after the injury report. Secondly, there is no evidence that the assault was by the workers of Prakash Vir Shastri. Shamshad Elahi in his evidence mentioned the names of Sevak and Surajbhan Tyagi. These names were not mentioned in the complaint being Exhibit-30. In cross-examination Shamshad Elahi was asked as to how he had obtained the names and his answer was that he met the grass cutter who gave the names. It is curious that the grass cutter who gave the names was not examined.

The third incident on which the appellant relied took place at Chhajjpur. The allegations are that on 2nd February, 1967 an election meeting was organised in support of the candidature of the appellant and the supporters of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri created disturbance with the result that the meeting could not be continued and the supporters of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri are alleged to have chased the appellant. The High Court rightly commented on the absence of any report having been made by the appellant to the Election Commissioner or the police about the alleged occurrence. It is obvious that if the appellant had been chased he would have made report to the Election Commission or to the police. The appellant relied on the news item in the Patriot, dated 5th February, 1967. The news item was referred to by Mahesh Chandra Agarwal, P.W. 14 who, however, was not present at the meeting at Chhajjpur. He referred to a conversation with the Superintendent of Police. The Senior Superintendent of Police was not examined. No police report was produced. The truth of the newspaper report was not corroborated nor was the statement in the news item proved. On the contrary, Mahesh Chandra Agarwal nullified the news item by admitting that he was not present at the meeting.

P.W. 18 Tejpal Singh spoke of the incident of 2nd February, 1967 and mentioned about the shouting of slogans and throwing of brick-bats. P.W. 10, Som Prakash spoke of charge-sheet under sections 147 and 342 of the Indian Penal Code against certain persons. He spoke of the report of 3rd February, 1967 and a report of 9th February, 1967. The report dated 3rd February, 1967 relates to the occurrence on 2nd February, 1967, Chhajjpur. The report of 9th February, 1967 relates to the alleged incident of 2nd February, 1967, at Chhajjpur. The witness Som Prakash P.W. 10 admitted that no investigation was made. It is significant that the name of the appellant is not mentioned in either of complaints or reports. The allegations in the report are that some disturbance was created and names of various persons are mentioned as having tried to run towards the jeep which carried the leaders of the Republican Party. One of the witnesses Devi Dayal Sen, P.W. 63 said that when the appellant rose to speak some people pelted stones at him.

The alleged incident at Chhajjpur is unacceptable because, first, there was no complaint by the appellant to the Election Commissioner, secondly, there was no police case and no investigation, thirdly, the reports did not mention the name of the appellant as having been assaulted or chased and fourthly, the news item in the Patriot was not proved as to the truth of the contents therein.

The fourth occurrence on which the appellant relied was at a place called Ophera. The appellant alleged that some persons were stopped from casting their votes. The appellant relied on the oral evidence of P.Ws. 58, 59 and 60. P.W. 60 is Manzoor Ahmad, M.L.A. The other two witnesses were Durga Das and Ram Prasad. The appellant criticised the judgment that there was no mention of the name of Manzoor Ahmad. The diaries being Exhibits A-23, A-32 and A-29 were produced to show that the election at Ophera polling station passed off peacefully and therefore no one stopped any voter from casting vote. Manzoor Ahmad in his oral evidence said that he saw people armed with lathis and ballams. He said that he made a complaint to the Presiding Officer and admitted in cross-examination that there was no written complaint. Manzoor Ahmad did not prove that any person was stopped from voting.

The fifth and the sixth occurrences on which the appellant relied took place at Datiyana and Bankhanda. It is alleged by the appellant that at Datiyana the agents and the supporters of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri threatened the Scheduled Caste and Harijan voters and prevented them from going to the polling station. The allegations about the occurrence at Bankhanda are to similar effect. The appellant relied on Exhibit 18 which was a memorandum addressed by several voters who stated that they remained within the house and could not vote because the village Tyagi Kailash Chand threatened to kill them if they would vote. P.W. 65, Vireshwar Tyagi spoke of the incidents at Nagola, Bankhanda and Hapur and his wife Smt. Prakash Vireshwar Tyagi spoke of the alleged incident at Datiyana. The respondent's witnesses denied that any person was prevented from casting vote at Datiyana.

The allegations with regard to the Bankhanda were referred to by Vireshwar Tyagi and other witnesses. The diary which was produced with regard to the polling station disproved any such incident. The diaries are Exhibits A-19 and A-21. D.W. 20, Chandoo Singh stated that he was at the polling station at Bankhanda and no one was stopped from exercising the right of franchise. D.Ws. 21 and 22 also spoke of polling at Bankhanda having been peaceful. The appellant referred to religious songs which were said to be in praise of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri. Mere praiseworthy songs will not be an instance of corrupt practice.

All the allegations about the voters having been stopped from casting their franchise followed the same pattern of oral evidence. The absence of any report either to the Election Commission or to the Police authorities is an important and noticeable feature and therefore the oral evidence is not acceptable.

The other allegations relied on by the appellant are that respondent Prakash Vir Shastri is guilty of corrupt practice under sub-sections (3), (3-A) and (4) of section 123 of the said Act. The appellant contended that respondent Prakash Vir Shastri made communal propaganda against the appellant and also published false statements in relation to the personal character of the appellant. In aid of the contentions the appellant relied on annexures KK and MM. The appellant relied on the upper portion of annexure KK in support of the contention that the slogans amounted to communal propaganda. The lower portion of annexure KK was contended by the appellant to be allegations against the personal character of the appellant. Annexure MM was said by the appellant to contain slogans amounting to communal propaganda against the appellant. It was said by the appellant that respondent Prakash Vir Shastri promoted feelings of enmity or hatred against the appellant and further raised communal propaganda. The appellant also relied on Exhibit-22 being the editorial in Vir Arjun, dated 7th February, 1967, in support of the contention that the editorial constituted communal propaganda against the appellant.

In Guruji Shrihari Baliram Jovatode v. Vithalrao and others.¹ this Court dealt with the scope and content of sub-section (4) of section 123 of the Act. The Act is intended to protect freedom of speech on the one hand and to restrain malicious propaganda on the other. The provisions contained in sub-section (4) of section 123 were said by this Court to be contravened when "any false allegation of fact pierces the politician and touches the person of the candidate". It is the personal character and conduct of the candidate which is to be protected from malicious or false attacks. The statement in question has to be first a false statement bearing on the personal character and conduct of the candidate and secondly, the statement complained of must be one which is reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of the election of the person.

Under the provisions contained in sub-section (3-A) of the said Act the promotion of, or attempt to promote, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of citizens of India on grounds of religion, race, caste, community, or language, is the mischief which is sought to be avoided by making the same a corrupt practice. The sub-section further says that such promotion or attempt to promote enmity or hatred is for the furtherance of the election of the candidate or for prejudicially affecting the election of any candidate.

The words "personal character or conduct" were explained by this Court in *T. K. Gangi Reddy v. M. C. Anjaneya Reddy and others*² "to be equated with his mental or moral nature. Conduct connotes a person's actions or behaviour". Annexure KK was not proved and therefore it cannot be said to constitute any communal propaganda. Assuming it were proved there is no appeal to vote for a person on the ground of religion nor is there any appeal not to vote for a person on the ground of his religion. Further, the provisions contained in sub-section (4) of section 123 require the publication with the consent of the candidate or his election agent. In the present case, annexure KK has not been established to be published with the consent of the respondent Prakash Vir Shastri or his election agent. It, therefore, follows that annexure KK offends neither the provisions contained in sub-section (3-A) nor in sub-section (4) of section 123 of the Act.

Annexure MM was said by the appellant to be a communal propaganda. Annexure MM was not proved. Even if it were proved the slogans do not offend the provisions of either sub-section (3-A) or sub-section (4) of section 123 of the Act.

The publication in the newspaper 'Vir Arjun' Exhibit-22 to the effect that differences between Hindus and Harijans were being spread by the supporters of the Republican candidate meaning thereby the appellant and if students from Muslim University were brought in by them then students from Ghaziabad would be brought into the field. The newspaper certainly was inclined in favour of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri but the newspaper publication said that Prakash Vir Shastri would not unlike the Congress candidate preach communal hatred. The statements in Exhibit-22 do not make any reflection on the moral or mental nature of the appellant and they do not touch the personal character of the appellant, nor do they promote enmity or hatred on grounds of religion.

The appellant failed to prove that respondent Prakash Vir Shastri committed any corrupt practice in relation to the personal character and conduct of the appellant. The newspaper publication Exhibit 22 was an appeal on behalf of respondent Prakash Vir Shastri. As long as the publication is not tainted by corrupt practice, such an appeal will not be an infraction of the provisions as to corrupt practices as contemplated in the Representation of the People Act. Suggestions that attempts are made to accentuate the differences between the Hindus and Harijans in the article cannot be extracted in isolation from the entire context. The electorate at the time of the election has to be kept in the forefront in judging whether the article can be said to offend the provisions relating to corrupt practices. The Court is to ascertain whether the statement is reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of the candidate's election. This Court observed in *Kultar Singh v. Mukhtiar Singh*¹ that in reading the documents it would be unrealistic to ignore that when appeals are made by candidate there is an element of 'partisan feeling' and there is 'extravagance of expression in attacking one another' and 'it would be unreasonable to ignore the question as to what the effect of the pamphlet would be on the mind of the ordinary voter who reads the pamphlet'. In the light of these principles, we are of opinion that there is no infraction of the provisions contained in sub-sections (3-A) and (4) of section 123 of the Act.

For the reasons mentioned above, this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Central Excises and salt Act, 1944 (I of 1944), Items 25, 26 and 26-A and column 3 of entry (i) of item 26-AA—Interpretation—Manufacture of wires out of imported steel rods—Imposition of excise duty—Levy to consist of ad valorem duty plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron and steel ingots as the case may—“For the time being leviable”, if indicates a rate—Column 3 of entry (i) if concerned with the actual ingots out of which wires are made—Clause not concerned with whether the steel ingot has paid the excise duty countervailing duty or not.

Indian Tariff Act (XXXII of 1934), First Schedule, item No. 63 (36).

The assessee manufactures iron and steel products. It manufactured wires out of steel rods, which had been imported by it prior to 24th April, 1962. Finance (No. 2) Act 1962 (Act No. XX of 1962) imposed for the first time excise duty on the Iron and Steel Products; and by sub-clause (s) of sub-section (2) of section 16 of the said Act an amendment was made to the first Schedule of the Central Excise and Salt Act, 1944 incorporating after, Item 26-A Item 26-AA. The relevant portion of that entry reads thus : Bars, rods, coils, wires—5 per cent ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron and Steel Ingots as the case may be.

The short point that arises is this : What is the duty leviable on the wires manufactured by the assessee out of steel rods which had already been imported? Held by (majority Hegde, J. dissenting) that the word 'plus' in the context indicates that the rate of duty consists of 2 parts : one part is ad-valorem duty and the other is the excise duty calculated according to the formula given. In other words, both duties have to be levied. These words indicate that choice has to be made between two types of excise duties—excise duty leviable on pigs iron or excise duty leviable on steel ingots. Sub-items (ii), (iii) and (iv) of Item 26-AA use the same set of words. In sub-Items (v) excise duty leviable on steel ingots is only mentioned. This sub-item consists of steel casting. This indicates that the duty is being calculated thus, because steel castings have been made from steel ingots. Item 26-AA deals with iron and steel products. It seems that the context indicates that the words "as the case may be" denote that the excise duty leviable on pig iron is to be charged if the product is an iron products; if it is a steel product then the excise duty leviable on steel ingots is to be levied. In other words, this decides the choice whether Item 25 (Pig iron) or Item 26 (steel ingots) is to be looked at.

Now to come the formula "the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots." Item 26-AA (i) simply prescribes a rate of duty as the heading of column indicates. It is not concerned with actual ingots out of which other articles are made. It is not concerned with whether that steel ingot has paid excise duty or countervailing duty or not. It is simple formula perhaps inartistically formulated. It is said that the item should be strictly construed, it being a taxing enactment. But no rule or principle of construction requires that close reasoning should not be employed to arrive at the true meaning of a badly drafted entry in an Excise Act.

It is difficult to appreciate how the insertion of Item No. 63 (36) in the First Schedule of the Tariff Act or the subsequent amendment of the Indian Tariff Act, 1934, by Indian Tariff (Amendment Act) 1963 throw any light on the interpretation of Item 26-AA (i). Item No. 63 (36) is in respect of the same iron and steel products as are mentioned in item 26-AA. The effect of column 4 is to levy an additional customs duty equivalent to the prevalent excise duty on like articles produced and manufactured. In other words, if the customs duty leviable under other entries in the Second Schedule on steel rods is 'D' an additional duty 'E' has to be levied equal to the excise duty leviable on steel rods, i.e., under item 26-AA. This has been called countervailing duty. The manufacturer in India, who used steel rods made in India, and made wires from them was given a certain relief by notification No. 77 of 1962, but the manufacturer in India who used steel rods made abroad to make wires was not first given this exemption. Later by amendments he was given a similar exemption. The only light thrown by these amendments and the notifications is that that it is not the idea to levy excise duty at various stages of manufacture of certain articles and this is achieved by issuing notifications giving appropriate reliefs. But if there is no relief given by notification the full duty at the rate mentioned in column 3 of entry (i) of Item 26-AA has to be paid.

Per Hegde, J. (dissenting): It is difficult to interpret the words "for the time being leviable" as indicating a rate. The expression "leviable on pig iron and steel ingots as the case may be" has reference to pig iron or steel ingots dutiable under the Act. In fiscal legislation the term "rate" is familiar term. In fact Entry 5 of the First Schedule dealing with salt speaks of "rate fixed annually by a Central Act". Therefore it would have been to easiest thing for the Parliament to convey its intention without ambiguity. At this stage it may also be noted that the clause in question refers to "the excise duty" and not excise duty in general. The definite article "the" has considerable significance. It refers to some particular excise duty. If the second part of the clause merely refers to a rate then the article "the" has no place in that context. The expression "the excise duty for time being leviable" by necessary implication refers to an article dutiable under the Act. That must necessarily be the article which is one of the components of the article on which duty is sought to be levied. In the instant case that must be the steel ingot used in the products of the "wires".

For the purpose of interpreting the clause in question, reference may also be made to entry 63 (36) in the First Schedule to the Tariff Act. It may be remembered that, that entry as well as entry 26-AA in the First Schedule of the Act were enacted simultaneously under Finance Act, (No. 2) of 1962. Both these entries came into force on the same day namely on 24th April, 1962. The Act and the Tariff Act are cognate legislations. In other words they are legislations which are pari materia. They form one code. They must be taken together as forming one system and as interpreting and enforcing each other. It is proper to assume from the surrounding circumstances, that these two entries were introduced in pursuance of a common purpose, that purpose being that the articles listed in Entry 26-AA whether produced out of indigenous Pig Iron or Steel Ingot or made out of imported Pig Iron or Steel Ingot must bear the same amount of duty. Evidently in order to equalise the duty on articles made out of indigenous material as well as imported material Entry 63 (36) of the First Schedule to the Tariff Act was enacted. In other words that entry imposes countervailing duty and not additional duty.

The effect of the Finance Act (No. 2) of 1962 and the various Notifications issued for the purpose of implementing the scheme under that Act is that excise duty is leviable at the rate mentioned in column 3 of Item 26-AA on pig iron or steel ingot used in the production of the article on which duty under Entry 26-AA is sought to be levied but to the extent any excise duty or countervailing custom duty had been paid on any of the material used in the manufacture of any of that article, the same is exempt. From this scheme it is clear that when Item 26-AA speaks of 'the excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron or Steel Ingots as the case may be' it refers to the excise duty payable on the Pig Iron or Steel Ingots used in the production of the article dutiable under that item. From the above discussion, it follows that the wires which are the subject-matter of the levy impugned in this case are not liable to pay the duty in dispute in this case.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Order dated the 2nd November, 1967 of the Government of India, Ministry of Finance, Department of Revenue and Insurance, New Delhi in Central Excise Revision Application No. 1323 of 1967.

A.K. Sen and S.V. Gupta, Senior Advocates (Rameshwar Nath and Mahinder Narain, Advocates of M/s. Rajinder Narain and Co., and Ravinder Nath, Advocate, with them, for Appellant.

V.A. Seyid Muhammad, Senior Advocate (S.P. Nayar, Advocate, with him), for Respondents.

The Court delivered the following judgments

Sikri, J., (Bachawat, J., agreeing) :—I have had the advantage of reading the draft judgment prepared by Hegde, J., but, while I agree with him that there is no force in the plea of limitation advanced on behalf of the assessee, in my opinion the appeal should fail on the ground that the excise duty was levied correctly as determined by the Central Government in its order dated 2nd November, 1967.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Hegde, J., It is only necessary to mention a few facts in order to make this judgment readable. The assessee manufactures iron and steel products. It manufactured wires out of steel rods, which had been imported by it prior to 24th April, 1962. Item 26-AA was added to the First Schedule of the Central Excises and Salt Act, 1944 (I of 1944)—hereinafter referred to as the Excise Act—by Finance Act (No. 2) of 1962 (XX of 1962) with effect from 24th April, 1962. This reads as under :

"26-AA. IRON OR STEEL PRODUCTS, THE FOLLOWING, NAMELY:

|---|--|
| (i) Bars, rods, coils wires, joists, girders angles, channels, tees, flats, beams, zeds, through, piling and all other rolled, forced or extruded shapes and sections, not otherwise specified. | Five per cent. ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots, as the case may be. |
| (ii) plates and sheets, other than plates and sheets intended for tinning, and hoops, and stripe, all sorts, including galvanised or corrugated plates and sheets. | Seven and a half per cent. ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots, as the case may be. |

- (iii) Uncoated plates and sheets intended for tinning. Seven and a half per cent. ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots, as the case may be.
- (iv) Pipes and tubes (including blanks, therefor) all sorts, whether rolled forged, spun, cast, drawn, annealed, welded or extruded. Five per cent. ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots, as the case may be.
- (v) All other steel castings, not otherwise specified. Five per cent. ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable on steel ingots."

The short point that arises is this: What is the duty leviable on the wires manufactured by the assessee out of steel rods which had already been imported? For the time being I will ignore notifications issued under rule 8 (1) of the rules made under the Excise Act, and the amendments made by the Finance Act (No. 2) of 1962, and Indian Tariff (Amendment Act) 1963 (III of 1963) to the Indian Tariff Act, 1934.

"Wires" are mentioned in item No. 26-AA (i). Therefore we have to scrutinize the third column of item 26-AA (i) for the rate of duty. Three points need clarification:

- (a) What is the meaning of or inference derivable from the word 'plus'?
- (b) What is the meaning of the formula "the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots?"
- (c) What is the import of the words "as the case may be?"

The word 'plus' in the context indicates that the rate of duty consists of 2 parts: one part is ad-valorem duty and the other is the excise duty calculated according to the formula given. In other words, both duties have to be levied. I will presently discuss what the formula means but this is clear that the third column contemplates one duty, consisting of two parts, being levied.

Before I discuss the meaning of the formula it will clarify matters if the import of the words "as the case may be" is first ascertained. These words indicate that a choice has to be made between two types of excise duties—excise duty leviable on pig iron or excise duty leviable on steel ingots. Sub-items (ii), (iii) and (iv) of item 26-AA use the same set of words. In Sub-item (v) excise duty leviable on steel ingots is only mentioned. This sub-item consists of steel casting. This indicates that the duty is being calculated thus because steel castings have been made from steel ingots. Item 26-AA deals with iron and steel products. It seems to me that the context indicates that the words "as the case may be" denote that the excise duty leviable on pig iron is to be charged if the product is an iron product; if it is a steel product then the excise duty leviable on steel ingots is to be levied. In other words, this decides the choice whether item 25 (Pig iron) or item 26 (steel ingots) is to be looked at. Although I was not enlightened on the point by Counsel during the course of the hearing, I have no doubt that the excise Department and the trade know how to distinguish a steel product from an iron product. If there is a dispute on the point it will have to be resolved in the future.

Now to come to the formula "the excise duty for the time being leviable on pig iron or steel ingots." Let me give a simple problem in order to illustrate the points which arise under this head of inquiry. "A" manufactures a steel ingot 'X' in May 1961 in Jamshedpur. He pays excise duty on it in May 1961 as he removes it out of the factory. Its value is determined at the wholesale cash price at the time of removal in accordance with section 4 of the Excise Act. Steel ingot 'X' is sold to a manufacturer "B" in Faridabad, who manufactures steel rods ('Y' & 'Z') out of it in May 1962 and removes them in May 1962. What is the excise duty payable on steel rods ('Y' & 'Z')? Ad valorem duty is easy to calculate. What about the additional duty? We know that the steel ingot 'X' has paid excise duty. But this does not make any difference. The additional duty has still to be calculated under the formula. It is also plain that no excise duty is strictly leviable under sections 3 and 4 of the Excise Act on Steel Ingot 'X' as such. Not only that it does not exist any longer but duty on it has already been paid and further no duty would be leviable under section 4 for it was removed from the factory long time ago in May 1961. Therefore, it is clear that the formula cannot be concerned with the particular ingot 'X' at all. It seems to me that what it is concerned with is the duty leviable on a hypothetical Steel Ingot if it had been manufactured or removed at the same time as the steel rods ('Y' & 'Z') were manufactured or removed. In the example given above, under the formula the excise duty leviable under item 26 in May 1962, would have to be charged, i.e., 39.35 per metric tonne. The weight to be taken into consideration would be the weight of steel rods 'Y' & 'Z' and not of the Steel Ingot 'X' out of which they were made.

It seems to me that this is the true interpretation of column 3 of Item 26-AA (i). It simply prescribes a rate of duty as the heading of column indicates. It is not concerned with actual ingots out of which other articles are made. It is not concerned with whether that Steel Ingot has paid excise duty or countervailing duty or not. It is a simple formula perhaps in artistically formulated. It is said that the item should be strictly construed, it being a taxing enactment. But no rule or principle of construction requires that close reasoning should not be employed to arrive at the true meaning of a badly drafted entry in an Excise Act. I believe I am not stretching the language of the entry against the subject, but it appears to me that in the context of the scheme of the Excise Act this is the only reasonable construction to give the entry.

If it is permissible to look at the notifications issued by the Central Government which have given reliefs of various kinds, they seem to me to proceed on the interpretation which I have given above. It will be noted that they do not exempt the article from the levy of duty; they give relief which may in a particular case be the excise duty or countervailing duty levied on the article out of which the assessed article has been manufactured.

To revert to the example given by me above, notification No. 70 of 1962 dated 24th April, 1962, would exempt manufacturer 'B' from so much of the duty of excise leviable on steel rods as is equivalent to the duty leviable under item 26. Therefore, reading entry 26-AA (i) with this notification, manufacturer 'B' does not pay the whole of the duty leviable on steel rods ('Y' & 'Z') under column 3 (item 26-AA) because the Steel Ingot which he has used had already paid the appropriate amount of duty.

I am not able to appreciate how the insertion of Item No. 63 (36) in the First Schedule of the Tariff Act or the subsequent amendment of the Indian Tariff Act, 1934, by Indian Tariff (Amendment Act) 1963 throw any light on the interpretation of Item 26-AA (i). Item No. 63 (36) is in respect of the same iron and steel products as are mentioned in Item 26-AA. Column 4 (standard rate of duty) reads:

"The excise duty for the time being leviable on like articles if produced or manufactured in India, and where such duty is leviable at different rates the highest duty and the duty so leviable shall be in addition to the duty which would have been levied if this entry had been inserted."

The effect of this entry is to levy an additional customs duty equivalent to the prevalent excise duty on like articles produced and manufactured. In other words, if the customs duty leviable under other entries in the Second Schedule on steel rods is 'D', an additional duty 'E' has to be levied equal to the excise duty leviable on steel rods, i.e., under item 26-AA. This has been called countervailing duty.

The manufacturer in India, who used steel rods made in India, and made wires from them was given a certain relief by notification No. 77 of 1962, but the manufacturer in India who used steel rods made abroad to make wires was not first given this exemption. Later by amendments he was given a similar exemption. The Central Excise Manual (Seventh Edition) at page 123 states the position thus:

"26-AA (2) Iron or steel products falling under item No. 26-AA, if made from another article falling under the said item or item No. 63 (36) of the First Schedule to the Indian Tariff Act, (XXXII of 1934) and having already paid the appropriate amount of excise or countervailing customs duty, are the case may be, are exempt with effect from 24th April, 1962, from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the excise or countervailing customs duty payable on the said article—vide Government of India, Ministry of Finance (Department of Revenue) Notification No. 89 of 1962 Central Excises, dated 10th May, 1962, (issued in supersession of Notification No. 77 of 1962—Central Excises, dated 24th April, 1962, as further amended by Notifications No. 93 of 1962—Central Excises dated 26th May, 1962 and No. 225 of 1962 Central Excises, dated 29th December, 1962."

The only light thrown by these amendments and the notifications referred to above is that that it is not the idea to levy excise duty at various stages of manufacture of certain articles and this is achieved by issuing notifications giving appropriate reliefs. But if there is no relief given by notification the full duty at the rate mentioned in column 3 of entry (i) of item 26-AA has to be paid.

In the result the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Hegde, J.—This is an appeal by special appeal leave. It is directed against the order of the Government of India in No. 1323 of 1967 dated 2nd November, 1967, rejecting the appellant's application for refund of the excise duty paid by him under protest.

In order to appreciate the controversy between the parties it is necessary to set out the material facts. The appellant is a Company having a factory at Rishara in the State of West Bengal. It manufactures, among other items, Iron and Steel Products such as Jute Baling Hoops, Wire Ropes, Cold Rolled Strips, Chain Pulley Blocks, Electric Hoists etc. Between December, 1961 and January, 1962 the appellant received various consignments of imported High Carbon Steel Wire Rods. Its opening stock of imported High Carbon Steel Wire Rods on 24th April, 1962, was 2788.401 metric tons. As before, the appellant manufactured wires from those steel rods even after 24th April, 1962.

Finance (No. 2) Act (XX of 1962) imposed for the first time excise duty on the Iron and Steel Products; and by sub-clause (S) of sub-section (2) of section 16 of the said Act an amendment was made to the first Schedule of the Central Excise and Salt Act, 1944 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) incorporating after item 26-A, item 26-AA. The relevant portion of that entry reads thus:

Iron or Steel Products.

- | | |
|--|--|
| (1) Bars, rods, coils, wires, joists, girders, | 5 per cent. ad valorem plus the |
| angles, channels, tees, flats beams, | excise duty for the time |
| zeds, trough, piling and all other | being leviable on Pig Iron |
| rolled, forged or extruded shapes | and Steel Ingots as the |
| and section not otherwise specified. | case may be. |

Pig Iron and Steel Ingots were already subject to excise duty under Items Nos. 25 and 26 in the First Schedule of the Act. The rate of duty in the case of the former at the material time was Rs. 10 per metric tonne and that of the latter Rs. 39/35 per metric tonne. The newly imposed duty under Item 26-AA came into force on 24th April, 1962. The Collector of Central Excise, West Bengal, Calcutta by a Trade Notice, Central Excise No. 32—Iron and Steel Products 2 of 1962 dated Calcutta the 16th May, 1962, notified the procedure to be followed.

By Notification No. 70 of 1962 dated 24th April, 1962, issued in exercise of the powers conferred by rule 8 (1) of the rules framed under the Act (to be hereinafter referred to as the rules), the Central Government exempted Iron and Steel Products falling under Item 26-AA, if made from Pig Iron or Steel Ingots on which the appropriate amount of excise duty has already been paid, from so much of the duty of the excise leviable thereon as is equivalent to the duty leviable under Item 25 or 26 as the case may be.

On the same day as per Notification No. 77 of 1962, the Central Government exempted Iron and Steel Products falling under sub-items (2), (3), (4) and (5) of Item 26-AA, if made from articles which have already paid the appropriate duty of excise under sub-item (1) of the said Item, from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the duty payable under the sub-item (1). Finance (No. 2) Act of 1962 by section 15 amended the First Schedule of the Tariff Act by adding Item No. 63 (36) which deals with imported Iron and Steel Products. The second column of that entry mentions the various Iron and Steel Products included therein. The items included therein are the very items set out in Item 26-AA of the First Schedule to the Act. The third column of that Item which specifies the levy reads thus:

“The excise duty for the time being leviable on like articles if produced or manufactured in India, and where such duty is leviable at different rates the highest duty so leviable shall be in addition to the duty which would have been levied if this entry had not been inserted.”

On 10th May, 1962, the Government issued a fresh Notification (No. 89 of 1962) under rule 8 (1) of the rules in supersession of the Notification No. 77 of 1962 dated 24th April, 1962. By that Notification, the Government exempted with effect from 24th April, 1962, Iron and Steel Products falling under Item 26-AA if made from another article falling under the said Item and having already paid the appropriate amount of duty from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the duty payable on the said article.

On the same day namely 10th May, 1962, the Government issued yet another Notification (Notification No. 90 of 1962) under rule 8 (1) under which it exempted Iron and Steel Products falling under Item 26-AA specified in column 2 of the table annexed to the Notification if made from Pig Iron or Steel Ingots on which appropriate amount of excise duty has already been paid, from so much of the duty of excise leviable on such products as in excess of the duty corresponding entry in column 3 of the said table. (Wire) the product with which we are concerned in this case is also included in the table. That Notification contains a proviso which says:

“Provided that if the products are made from Pig Iron and Steel Ingots on which appropriate amount of duty has not been paid the excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron or Steel Ingots as the case may be shall be payable in addition to the duties specified in the appropriate entry in column 3 of the table.”

On 29th December, 1962, the Government issued yet another Notification under rule 8 (1) amending the Notification No. 89 of 1962 issued on 10th May, 1962. In the place of words “If made from another article falling under the said item and having already paid the appropriate amount of duty from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the duty payable on the said article,” the following was substituted:

“If made from another article falling under the said Item or Item No. 63 (36) of the First Schedule to the Indian Tariff Act (XXXII of 1934), and having already paid the appropriate amount of excise or countervailing custom duty as the case may be from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the excise or countervailing custom duty payable on the said article”.

By Indian Tariff (Amendment Act 1963) (Act III of 1963) effective from the 25th January, 1963, the Indian Tariff Act 1934 was amended and after section 2, the following section was inserted namely:

“2 (a) (1). Any article which is imported into India shall be liable to custom duty equal to the excise duty for the time being leviable on a like article if produced or manufactured in India.

Explanation :—In this sub-section the expression “the excise duty for the time being leviable on a like article if produced or manufactured in India” means the excise duty for the time being in force which would be leviable on a like article if produced or manufactured in India or if a like article is not so produced or manufactured, which would be leviable on the class or description of articles to which the imported article belongs and where such duty is leviable at different rates, the highest duty.

(2) The customs duty referred to in sub-section (i) shall be in addition to any duty imposed under this Act or under any other law for the time being in force."

On or after 24th April, 1962, the appellants cleared from their warehouse wires produced from the aforementioned imported Steel Rods after obtaining the required permission from the excise authorities and after paying the duty assessed. On those wires, duty was assessed without taking into consideration "the excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron and Steel Ingots as the case may be." At that time the Central Excise authorities proceeded on the basis that on the stock of wire in question only ad valorem duty had to be levied and not "excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron or Steel Ingots as the case may be." On 21st March, 1962, the Inspector of Central Excise attached to M/s. J. K. Steel Ltd., Rishara issued the following notice;

Inspector I/C Central Excise
M/s. J.K. Steel Ltd., Rishara.

The appellants objected to the demand in question as per their letter of 24th March, 1963. They contended that they had not contravened rule 9 (2) of the rules nor was there any short levy. As per his letter of 26th August, 1963, the Assistant Collector of Central Excise Calcutta 4th Division confined the demand to that made under serial No. 3 of the notice. The appellants paid the same under protest and thereafter took up the matter in appeal to the Collector of Central Excise who dismissed their appeal as per his order of 19th March, 1964, with these observations:

“The crucial point of this appeal is whether countervailing import duty was paid by the appellants on the imported steel rods from which steel wires were manufactured. The appellants could not produce any documents in support of their argument that either import duty or countervailing duty equivalent to Steel Ingot rate was paid by them on the iron rods from which steel wires were drawn. Such duty is leviable on steel rods under tariff item No. 26-AA. As no such duty on steel rods was paid by the appellants, countervailing duty equivalent to Steel Ingot duty has, therefore, to be paid.”

As against the order of the Collector, the appellants went up in revision to the Central Government. The Central Government allowed the revision petition to some extent. This is what the Central Government ordered:

“The Government of India have carefully considered all the points raised by the petitioners but see no reason to interfere with the Collectors stated that the Steel Wires manufactured out of steel wire rods imported prior to 24th April, 1962, on which no countervailing duty was paid, and cleared during the period, from 24th April, 1962 to 10th August, 1963, were subject to full duty as then leviable under Item 26-AA (1) of Central Excise Tariff.

However the demand for differential duty initially made on 2nd March, 1963 and subsequently amended vide the Assistant Collector's order dated 26th August, 1963, shall be restricted to the clearance effected during the 3 months period prior to the initial service of demand on 21st March, 1963, that is to say, upto 21st December, 1962, only as per the provisions of Rule 10 of Central Excise Rules, 1944, which was applicable to this case. The demand in respect of clearances effected prior to 21st December, 1962, is hereby set aside and consequential refund shall be granted to the petitioners.

Subject to the above modifications, the revision application is otherwise rejected.”

Aggrieved by that order, the appellants have brought this appeal. The questions that arise for decision in this appeal are:

- (1) What is the true scope of entry No. 26-AA of the First Schedule to the Act?
- (2) In considering the scope of the said entry, can the Notifications issued by the Government on or after 24th April, 1962; can be taken into consideration?
- (3) Is the demand barred by limitation under rule 10 of the rules?

One other question had been raised in the grounds of appeal namely that the order of the Central Government is vitiated as it had contravened the principles of natural justice. That contention was not pressed at the hearing. In the context of this case that contention loses much of its significance. If we accept the appellant's contention as regards the scope of entry 26-AA then that the Government's order is illegal is immaterial. If on the other hand we accept the interpretation placed by the Revenue on that entry remand of the case to Central Government serves no purpose.

I shall now proceed to consider the questions earlier formulated for decision.

According to the assessee the true import of the clause in column 3 of entry 26-AA is that goods mentioned in column 2 of that entry are dutiable at 5 per cent. ad valorem plus the excise duty for the time being leviable under the Act on Pig Iron or Steel Ingot used in the production of these goods. Shri A. K. Sen, the learned Counsel for the assessee urged that that the expression leviable in that clause means leviable under the Act; in other words dutiable under the Act; the words 'Pig Iron' and 'Steel Ingots' referred to therein is the Pig Iron or the Steel Ingot used in manufacture of the articles on which duty is sought to be levied; otherwise the word leviable becomes inappropriate. In other words according to him the second limb of the levy under that clause is attracted only when any Pig Iron or Steel Ingot dutiable under the Act is used in the manufacture of any article dutiable under sub-clause (1) of entry 26-AA. As the steel bars used in manufacturing the 'wires' with which we are concerned in this case were not made out of Steel Ingot dutiable under the Act, as they were imported bars, that part of the levy is not attracted on those wires.

The contention for the Revenue is that the expression "the excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron or Steel Ingot as the case may be" sets out only a measure; the rate at which the duty is leviable; it has no reference to any particular material; it is merely a yardstick. The argument of Dr. Syed Muhammad, learned Counsel for the Revenue proceed thus:

The entry in question deals with two classes of products i.e., iron products and steel products. The assessing authority has first to decide whether a particular article is an iron product or steel product. If he comes to the conclusion that it is a steel product then he should assess the duty payable firstly by determining the ad valorem duty payable on it, thereafter he must find out its weight in metric tons and add to the ad valorem duty the amount payable as excise duty under entry 26 of the First Schedule on Steel Ingot of that weight.

If the intention of the Parliament was as suggested by the learned Counsel for the Revenue then column 3 should have read thus:

"5 per cent. ad valorem plus excise duty at the rate for the time being leviable on Pig Iron or Steel Ingots as the case may be."

It is difficult to interpret the words "for the time being leviable" as indicating a rate. The expression "leviable on Pig Iron and Steel Ingots as the case may be" in my opinion has reference to Pig Iron or Steel Ingots dutiable under the Act. In fiscal legislation the term "rate" is a familiar term. In fact entry 5 of the First Schedule dealing with salt speaks of "rate fixed annually by a Central Act." Therefore it would have been the easiest thing for the Parliament to convey its intention without ambiguity. At this stage it may also be noted that the clause in question refers to "the excise duty" and not excise duty in general. The definite article "the" has considerable significance. It refers to some particular excise duty. If the second part of the clause merely refers to a rate then the article "the" has no place in that context.

It was urged on behalf of the Revenue that to accept the contention of the assessee and to hold that the second part of the clause refers to the Steel Ingot used in the production of the "wires" is to read into the clause the words "used in the production of the article in question." It was said that such a construction is impermissible. Therefore we should not accede to that contention. I am not prepared to accept that reasoning. In fact in my opinion to accept the construction contended for on behalf of the Revenue, it would be necessary for us to include the words "at the rate" after the words "excise duty" and before the words "for the time being." No such difficulty arises if we accept the interpretation placed by the assessee on that clause. The expression "the excise duty for the time being leviable" by necessary implication refers to an article dutiable under the Act. That must necessarily be the article which is one of the components of the article on which duty is sought to be levied. In the instant case that must be the Steel Ingot used in the production of the "wires" with which we are concerned in this case.

As laid down by this Court in *G. A. Abraham v. I. T.O., Kottayam and another*¹—

1. (1961) 1 An. W.R. (S.C.) 183; (1961) 1 1961 S.C. 609 at 612.

"In interpreting¹ a fiscal statute the Court cannot proceed to make good deficiencies if there may be any; the Court must interpret the statute as it stands and in case of doubt in a manner favourable to the tax payer."

This Court also laid down in *Commissioner of Income-tax v. Karamchand Premchand Ltd. Ahmedabad*¹, that if there is any ambiguity of language in fiscal statute, benefit of that ambiguity must be given to the assessee. At this stage I am tempted to recall to my mind the well known observations of Lord Russel of Killowen in *Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster*² viz.,

"I confess that I view with disfavour the doctrine that in taxation cases the subject is to be taxed if in accordance with a Court's view of what it considers the substance of the transaction, the Court thinks that the case falls within the contemplation or spirit of the statute. The subject is not taxable by inference or by analogy, but only by the plain words of a statute applicable to the facts and circumstances of this case."

About a century ago Lord Cairns in *Partington v. The Attorney General*³ observed :

"As I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation it is this; If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appeared to be."

Unless I am satisfied that the only reasonable interpretation, that can be placed on the clause in col. 3 of entry 26-AA is that placed by the Revenue, it is not possible to justify the impugned levy.

There is yet another difficulty in accepting the interpretation tried to be placed by the Revenue on entry 26-AA. According to books on steel making Pig iron is the intermediate form through which almost all Iron must pass in the manufacture of steel. (see, "The Making, Shipping and Treating of Steel" edited by Harold E. McGannon at page 384). Therefore every steel product is also an iron product. If the second part of the clause in column 3 of entry 26-AA refers to a rate and not the duty leviable on the material used in the manufacture of the dutiable article under that entry then question arises whether the rate in question is that at which duty is leviable on Steel Ingot or that leviable on Pig Iron. That part of the clause refers to two different materials dutiable at different rates. If on the other hand it refers to the material from which the article on which duty is sought to be levied is made—the proximate raw material and not the material from which that raw material is made, then there is no difficulty in finding out the amount.

Dr. Syed Muhammad was not able to tell us how the assessing authorities classify articles into Iron products and Steel products. It is not his case that there is any recognised basis for doing so. It is also not his case that there is any prescribed procedure for deciding that question. His explanation that it is done on the basis of the practice prevailing in the trade is far from satisfactory. He was not able to tell us how we can ascertain that practice or what that practice is. If his contention is correct then the power of the assessing authorities to determine the nature of an article is an arbitrary power. It is undefined and unguided. The determination may vary from officer to officer. It is doubtful whether such a power is a valid power. That apart Legislature is not likely to have conferred such an arbitrary power on the authorities. That difficulty will not arise if the duty under the second limb of the entry in column 3 of entry 26-AA is determined on the basis of the actual material used.

For the purpose of interpreting the clause in question, reference may also be made to entry 63 (36) in the First Schedule to the Tariff Act. It may be remembered that that entry as well as entry 26-AA in the First Schedule of the Act were enacted simultaneously under Finance (No. 2) Act, 1962. Both these entries came into force on the same day namely on 24th April 1962. The Act and the Tariff Act are cognate legislations. In other words they are legislations which are pari materia. They form one code. They must be taken together as forming one system and as interpreting and enforcing each other. It is proper to assume from the surrounding circumstances, that these two entries were introduced in pursuance of a common purpose, that purpose being that the articles listed in entry 26-AA whether produced out of indigenous Pig Iron or Steel Ingot or made out of imported Pig Iron or Steel Ingot must bear the same amount of duty. If the interpretation placed on entry 26-AA by the learned Counsel for the assessee is accepted then it would be seen that that entry by itself would not impose the duty contemplated by the second part of the clause in column 3 of entry 26-AA on imported Pig Iron or Steel Ingot. Evidently in order to equalise the duty on articles made out of indigenous material as well as imported material entry 63 (36) of the First Schedule to the Tariff Act was enacted. In other words that entry imposes countervailing duty and not additional duty. It was conceded by the learned Counsel for the Revenue that the duty levied under entry 63 (36) of the First Schedule of the Tariff Act is only a countervailing duty. If that be so, that duty cannot be considered as an additional duty over and above the duty imposed under entry 26-AA of the First Schedule of the Act. But it would be an additional duty if the interpretation of entry 26-AA canvassed on behalf of the Revenue is accepted because according to the Revenue the rate prescribed in that entry is equally applicable to all articles mentioned therein whether manufactured from indigenous or imported material. If that be so the duty collected under entry 63 (36) of the First Schedule under the Tariff Act will be an additional duty and not a countervailing duty. It is true that despite entry 26-AA of the First Schedule to the Act and entry 63(36) of the First Schedule of the Tariff Act if Pig Iron or Steel Ingot imported before 24th April, 1962, is used in the manufacture of an article dutiable under entry 26-AA only the ad valorem duty prescribed under that entry can be levied on that article. It may be that the Legislature intended it to be so or there is a lacuna in the provision. In either case the effect is the same.

1. (1960) 3 S.C.R. 727, at p. 742 : (1960) S.C.J. 1289 : 40 I.T.R. 106.

I now come to the question whether in interpreting a taxing entry I can take any aid from the various steps taken by the Department in implementing that levy. I have earlier referred to a large number of Notifications issued under rule 8 (1) of the rules. The parties have also produced before us the instructions issued by the Department on 16th May, 1962 in the matter of implementation of entry 26-AA. I have now to see whether any aid can be taken from these instructions as well as the Notifications for finding out the true scope of entry 26-AA.

So far as the instructions issued by the Department are concerned there is hardly any doubt that the same are wholly irrelevant. In Craies on Statute Law, Sixth Edition at page 131 it is stated :

“Explanatory notes regarding the working of an Act issued by a Government department for the assistance of their officials are inadmissible for the purpose of construing the Act.”

The same conclusion was arrived at by this Court in *Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras v. K. Srinivasan and K. Gopalan*¹. At pages 502-503 of that report it is observed :

“He (learned Counsel for the assessee), however, drew our attention to the directions contained in the Income-tax Manual in force for a number of years and contended that the department itself placed on sub-sections (3) and (4) of section 25 the same construction as was placed on them by the Senior Judge in the High Court and that was the true construction of these two sub-sections. This argument in our opinion, has no validity. The department changed its view subsequently and amended the manual. The interpretation placed by the department on these sub-sections cannot be considered to be a proper guide in a matter like this when the construction of a statute is involved."

1. (1953) S.C.J. 115 : (1953) 1 M.L.J. 436 : (1953) S.C.R. 486 : at pp. 502-503.

Therefore I have to exclude from consideration the instructions issued by the Government.

This takes me to the Notifications issued by the Government under rule 8 (1) of the rules. Under section 38 of the Act all rules made and notifications issued under the Act shall be made and issued by publication in the official Gazette. All such rules and notifications shall thereupon have effect as if enacted in the Act. The rules made have to be placed on the table of the Parliament. The Parliament can amend those rules. Section 38 is of no assistance to us in the present case because the notifications referred to earlier are not those issued under the Act. They are notifications issued under rule 8 (1) of the rules. Therefore their relevance has to be considered without taking any assistance from section 38. In Halsbury's Laws of England 3rd edition, volume 36, at page 401, it is observed :

"Where a statute provides that subordinate legislation made under it is to have effect as if enacted in the statute such legislation may be referred to for the purpose of construing a provision in the statute itself. Where a statute does not contain such a provision, and does not confer any power to modify the application of the statute by subordinate legislation, it is clear that subordinate legislation made under the statute cannot alter or vary the meaning of the statute itself where it is unambiguous, and it is doubtful whether such legislation can be referred to for the purpose of construing an expression in the statute, even if the meaning of the expression is ambiguous."

No decision of this Court or of any of the High Courts in this country dealing with this aspect has been brought to my notice. Even the Counsel for the parties were not definite about the stand that they should take. They were changing their position again and again. On this question the opinion in English Courts is not unanimous. That question came up for consideration as early as 1871 in *Ex parte Wier*¹. In re Wier Sir G. Mellish, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court observed :

"We do not think that any other section of the Act throws any material light upon the proper construction of this section, and if the question had depended upon the Act alone we should have had great doubt what the proper construction was ; but we are of opinion that, where the construction of the Act is ambiguous and doubtful on any point, recourse may be had to the rules which have been made by the Lord Chancellor under the authority of the Act, and if we find that in the rules any particular construction has been put on the Act, that it is our duty to adopt and follow that construction."

In *Re Normal Ex parte Board of Trade*², Lord Esher, M.R., observed :

"It was urged that we ought to hold the Act to be retrospective by reason of the rules and forms which have been made under it, and which have a statutory force; and it is said that they shew that the trustee must go back in his accounts to matters which happened before the Act came into operation. But, when we look at the forms, we see that they are in express terms headed so as to relate to transactions taking place after the coming into operation of the Act ; and, therefore, they supply no reason why we should depart from the ordinary rule that an Act is not retrospective."

From these observations, it is clear that Lord Esher did take into consideration the subordinate legislation in considering the principal Act :

In *Billings v. Reed*³, Lord Greene stated that :

"The fact that the object of this Act was in substance what I have suggested can be seen from a consideration of the way in which the scheme has been framed pursuant to the Act itself and with the tacit approval of Parliament as provided in the Act. At any arate, we are entitled to look at the scheme for the purpose of seeing the kind of practical treatment of these questions which Parliament has authorised."

1. Ch. Appeal Cases (Vol. 6) at p. 879.

2. (1893) 2 Q.B. Dn. 369 at 373.

3. (1945) 2 K.B. 11.

From this observation, it is seen that the larned Judge did look into the subordinate legislation in finding out the object of the Act.

In *Hales v. Bolton Leathers Ltd.*¹, Somervell, L.J., observed :

"The country Court Judge was referred as we were, to various paragraphs in the regulations made under the Act of 1946. He took the view that these regulations could not affect the construction of the Act. The regulation making power is conferred by section 89, sub-section (1), proviso (b), and is as follows :

regulations may make such transitional or consequential provisions as appear to the Minister to be necessary or expedient, having regard to the repeal of the said enactments in relation to diseases and to injuries not caused by accident, including provision for modifying or winding up any scheme made thereunder. We agree that these regulations could not contradict the Act. They might, we think, properly be referred to as working out in detail the provisions of the Act consistently with its terms."

In *Howgate v. Ganall and another*², Barry, J., observed :

"I cannot, of course, have recourse to these schemes as guide to the correct interpretation of the Act under which they were made, but I am, I think, entitled to consider them for certain limited purposes. In *Billings v. Reed*³, Lord Green, M.R., said in reference to a scheme made under the Act : The fact that the object of this Act was in substance what I have suggested can be seen from a consideration of the way in which the scheme has been formed pursuant to the Act itself and with the tacit approval of Parliament as provided in the Act. At any rate we are entitled to look at the scheme for the purpose of seeing the kind of practical treatment of these questions which Parliament has authorized. It is abundantly clear from the wording of the various schemes made under the Act that the Minister, with the tacit consent of Parliament has throughout considered that "war injuries" may be sustained outside the United Kingdom....."

The decision in *Hales v. Bolton Leathers Ltd.*¹, to which reference has been made earlier was taken in appeal to the House of Lords. The judgment of the House of Lords is reported in (1951) A.C. P. 531. Dealing with the question whether subordinate legislation could be taken into consideration in interpreting the principal Act, Lord Simonds said :

"I much doubt whether I am entitled to look to the regulation for guidance on the meaning of the word in sub-section (1), but I will say something on this point later."

Reverting back to that topic again (at page 541 of the report) the learned Judge observed :

"First, if I may look at the regulations made under section 55, sub-section (4), to assist in the interpretation of the word, I agree with my noble and learned friend Normand, in thinking that they assist or at least are [consistent with this interpretation."

Lord Normand one of the other Judges who heard the appeal observed :

"The National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) (Prescribed Diseases) Regulations, 1948, were made under section 55, sub-section (4), and though in my opinion they cannot control the construction of the Act, it is yet of some importance to consider whether they fit into the construction which I think the Act properly bears."

1. (1950) K.B. 493 at p. 505.

2. (1951) 1 K.B. 265 at spl. p. 274.

3. (1945) K.B. 11.

Lord Oaksey in the same case was positive that the regulations could be looked into for certain limited purposes. This is what he observed :

“I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the regulations themselves (National Insurance (Industrial Injuries.) (Prescribed Diseases) Regulations, 1948) cannot alter the meaning of the words of the statute, but they may, I think be looked at as being an interpretation placed by the appropriate Government department on the words of the statute.”

Therein Lord MacDermott also took the assistance of the regulations while considering the statute.

Lastly we come to the decision of the Chancery Division. In *London Country Council v. General Land Board*¹, Danckwerts, J., in that case referred to the regulations made under the Housing Act, 1936 while construing the provisions of the Act.

From the above decisions, it is clear that several judges in England have referred to the subordinate legislation made under a statute for the purpose of interpreting that statute though for the limited purpose of knowing how the department which was entrusted with the task of implementing that statutes, had understood that statute. In the case of fiscal statutes, it may not be inappropriate to take into consideration the exemptions granted in interpreting the nature and the scope of the impost. In the matter of fiscal legislation the initiative is in the hands of the executive. Under Article 112 (1) of our Constitution, the President shall in respect of every financial year cause to be laid before both the Houses of Parliament a statement of the estimated receipts and expenditure for that year. Under sub-Article (3) of Article 113 no demand for a grant shall be made except on the recommendation of the President. In the matter of taxation very large powers are left in the hands of the executive. Generally speaking the question of exemption is left to the discretion of the Government. It ought to be so because the exercise of that power depends on various circumstances some of which cannot be anticipated in advance. But yet the levy and exemptions are parts of the same scheme of taxation. The two together carry into effect the purpose of the legislation. For finding out the true scheme of a taxing measure we have to take into consideration not merely the levy but also the exemptions granted. This Court in *Kailash Nath and another v. State of U.P. and others*², held that the exemption granted in pursuance of a notification issued under the U.P. Sales Tax Act must be considered as having been contained in the parent Act itself. This is what this Court stated therein :

“This notification having been made in accordance with the power conferred by the statute has statutory force and validity and, therefore, the exemption is as if it is contained in the parent Act itself.”

I do not think it is necessary for me to decide in this case the general question whether subordinate legislation can be used for interpreting a provision in the parent Act. I am not unaware of the danger in accepting that it could be so done. But for the present purpose, it is sufficient to hold that for finding out the scope of a particular levy, notifications issued by the executive Government providing for exemption from that levy can be looked into as they disclose the overall scheme.

Even according to the learned Counsel for the Revenue the notifications referred to earlier were issued with a view to avoid double taxation. If that is so, the exemption granted under those notifications provide a clue as to the scope of the levy made under Item 26-AA.

We have earlier seen that on the very day, the levy came into force the Government had issued two notifications i.e., Notifications Nos. 70 and 77 of 1962. Under Notification No. 70 it exempted Iron and Steel Products falling under item 26-AA if made from Pig Iron or Steel Ingots on which the appropriate amount of duty has already been paid, from so much duty of the excise leviable thereon as is equivalent to the duty leviable under item 25 or as the case may be under Item 26. Under Notification No. 77, it exempted Iron and Steel Products falling under sub-item Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 of Item 26-AA, if made from articles which have already paid appropriate duty of excise under sub-item (1) of the said item from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the duty payable under the said sub-item (1). These Notifications clearly indicate that under Item 26-AA, there was no intention to levy double excise duty on the same material. The intention appears to be that if one article is made out of another article both of which are subject to excise duty, the excise duty paid on the raw material should be deducted in computing the excise duty payable on the finished product. In addition these Notifications clearly show that the Pig Iron and Steel Ingot mentioned in clause 3 of entry 26-AA are those used in the manufacture of the article on which duty is sought to be levied under that entry.

1. (1959) Ch. D. 386.

2. A.I.R. 1957 S.C. 790.

In this connection we may also refer to Notification No. 89/62. Notification No. 77/62 referred merely to Iron and Steel Products falling under sub-items 2, 3, 4 and 5 of item 26-AA manufactured out of articles falling under sub-item (1) thereof. That Notification by itself was not all comprehensive. It did not take in other articles made out of Pig Iron or Steel Ingot. It is for that reason Notification No. 89/62 was issued on 10th May, 1962, under which exemption was given with effect from 24th April, 1962, to all Iron and Steel Products falling under Item 26-AA if made from another article falling under the said item and having already paid appropriate amount of duty from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the duty payable on the said article. Notifications Nos. 70, 77 and 89 exempted payment of excise duty on an article to the extent duty had been paid on the raw material used in the manufacture of the article dutiable under entry 26-AA. All these Notifications proceeded on the basis that the second limb of the levy in column 3 of entry 26-AA refers to the duty payable on the Pig Iron or Steel Ingot, as the case may be used in the manufacture of an article dutiable under entry 26-AA.

But the above Notifications do not deal with the countervailing duty levied under entry 63 (36) of the First Schedule to the Tariff Act. This was clearly an omission. To make good that omission the Government amended Notification No. 89/62 by its order dated 29th December, 1962. The amended Notification in addition to the exemption already given under Notification No. 89/62 also exempted from the payment of duty any article falling within any of the sub-items in items 26-AA if made from an article on which countervailing duty has been paid under item 63 (36) of the First Schedule to the Tariff Act from so much of the duty of excise as is equivalent to the countervailing custom duty payable on the said article. This Notification clearly shows that the countervailing duty in question was levied on the basis that the excise duty contemplated by entry 26-AA will not apply to articles made out of imported Pig Iron or Steel Ingot. Further if the legislature intended the duty under entry 63 (36) to be an additional duty, the exemption granted would nullify the legislative mandate.

To summarise the effect of the Finance (No. 2) Act of 1962 and the various Notifications issued for the purpose of implementing the scheme under that Act is that excise duty is leviable at the rate mentioned in column 3 of Item 26-AA on pig iron or steel ingot used in the production of the article on which duty under entry 26-AA is sought to be levied but to the extent any excise duty or countervailing custom duty had been paid on any of the material used in the manufacture of any of that article, the same is exempt. From this scheme it is clear that when Item 26-AA speaks of "the excise duty for the time being leviable on Pig Iron or Steel Ingots as the case may be" it refers to the excise duty payable on the Pig Iron or Steel Ingots used in the production of the article dutiable under that item.

From the above discussion, it follows that the wires which are the subject-matter of the levy impugned in this case are not liable to pay the duty in dispute in this case.

At one stage it was contended on behalf of the assessee that the levy under sub-item (1) of Item 26-AA comes into effect only when an article is made directly from out of Pig Iron or Steel Ingot as the case may be and not otherwise. It is not necessary to examine the correctness of this contention because at no stage the assessee had challenged his liability to pay ad valorem duty under Item 26-AA. He paid the same without objection nor had he claimed refund of the same.

I shall now take up the question of limitation. The written demand made on 21st March, 1963 purports to have been made under rule 9 (2) of the rules. Therein the assessing authority demanded steel ingot duty which according to it the assessee had failed to pay. Quite clearly rule 9 (2) is inapplicable to the facts of the case. Admittedly the assessee had cleared the goods from the warehouse after paying the duty demanded and after obtaining the permission of the concerned authority. Hence there is no question of any evasion. Despite the fact that the assessee challenged the validity of the demand made on him, both the Assistant Collector as well as the Collector ignored that contention; but when the matter was taken up to the Government it treated the demand in question as a demand under rule 10. The Government confined the demand to clearance effected after 21st December, 1962. The demand so modified is in conformity with rule 10. But the contention of the assessee is that the demand having been made under rule 9 (2) and there being no indication in that demand that it was made under rule 10, the Revenue cannot now change its position and justify the demand under rule 10; at any rate by the time the Government amended the demand, the duty claimed became barred even under rule 10. We are unable to accept this contention as correct. There is no dispute that the officer who made the demand was competent to make demands both under rule 9 (2) as well as under rule 10. If the exercise of a power can be traced to a legitimate source, the fact that the same was purported to have been exercised under a different power does not vitiate the exercise of the power in question. This is a well settled proposition of law. In this connection reference may usefully be made to the decisions of this Court in *B. Balakotaish v. The Union of India and others*¹ and *Aziz Ullah v. State of U.P.*². Further a common form is prescribed for issuing notices both under rule 9 (2) and rule 10. The incorrect statements in the written demand could not have prejudiced the assessee. From his reply to the demand, it is clear that he knew as to the nature of the demand. Therefore I find no substance in the plea of limitation advanced on behalf of the assessee.

For the reasons mentioned above, this appeal is allowed and the Revenue is directed to refund the excess duty paid under protest.

under section 156 read with section 210 of the Act calling upon the petitioner to pay on or before March, 1965, advance tax of Rs. 11,51,235-91 as agent of the foreign principal during the financial year 1964-65. The petitioner then moved a petition in the Supreme Court for an order quashing and setting aside the order under section 163 and notice of demand under section 156 for the assessment year 1965-66 and for an injunction or prohibition restraining the Income-tax Officer from enforcing or implementing the order under section 163 and the notice under section 156 read with section 210 of the Income-tax Act, 1961.

Held, that sections 207 and 208 which impose liability to pay advance tax in a financial year, section 210 which authorise the Income-tax Officer to make a demand for payment of advance tax from a person who is previously assessed, and section 212 (3) which imposes the duty to make an estimate of the total income likely to be received or to accrue or arise and to pay advance-tax if the total estimated income exceeds the maximum amount not chargeable to tax in his case by Rs. 2,500, apply to every person whether he is assessed in respect of his own income or as a representative assessee, and there is nothing to imply an unexpressed limitation on the express words of the statute in favour of an agent of a non-resident principal.

The provisions imposing liability to pay advance tax upon an agent of a non-resident do not infringe the equality clause of the Constitution.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Shah, J.—On 25th February, 1965, the Income-tax Officer, Companies Circle I (3), Bombay, directed that for the purpose of the Income-tax Act, 1961, the Premier Automobiles Ltd.—hereinafter called “the company”—be treated as an agent of M/s. Dodge Brothers of United Kingdom—a non-resident company. On the same day the Income-tax Officer issued a notice of demand under section 156 read with section 210 of the Act calling upon the company to pay on or before March, 1965, advance tax of Rs. 11,51,235-91 as agent of the foreign principal during the financial year 1964-65. The company then moved a petition in this Court for an order quashing and setting aside the order under section 163 and notice of demand under section 156 for the assessment year 1965-66 and for an injunction or prohibition restraining the Income-tax Officer from enforcing or implementing the order under section 163 and the notice under section 156 read with section 210 of the Income-tax Act, 1961. The petition was resisted by the Income-tax Officer.

In support of the petition, Counsel for the company raised two contentions :

(1) that under sections 209 and 210 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1961, no order for payment of advance tax can be made against an agent of a non-resident ; and

(2) that a provision which authorises collection of advance tax from an agent of a non-resident infringes the equality clause of the Constitution and is on that account void.

Sections 207 and 208 of the Income-tax Act, 1961, in so far as they are material, provide :

207—“(1) Tax shall be payable in advance in accordance with the provisions of sections 208 to 219 in the case of income other than income chargeable under the head ‘Capital gains.’

208—Advance tax shall be payable in the financial year :—

(a) where the total income exclusive of capital gains of the assessee referred to sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of section 209 exceeded the maximum amount not chargeable to income-tax in his case by two thousand five hundred rupees ; or

(b)

Section 209 sets out the rules for computation of amount of advance tax payable by an assessee in the financial year. Section 210 provides by sub-section (1)—

“Where a person has been previously assessed by way of regular assessment under this Act or under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the Income-tax Officer may, on or after the 1st day of April in the financial year by order in writing, require him to pay to the credit of the Central Government advance tax determined in accordance with the provisions of sections 207, 208 and 209”.

Sections 207, 208, 209 and 210 prescribe machinery for imposition of liability for and determination of the quantum of advance tax in respect of income which is chargeable to income-tax in the hands of a person on regular assessment.

Under the Income-tax Act, 1961 a person is liable to be assessed to tax in respect of his own income, and also in respect of certain classes of income received by or accruing or arising to others. He is also liable to be assessed to tax as a representative assessee. That is expressly so enacted by section 161 (1) which provides :

“Every representative assessee, as regards the income in respect of which he is a representative assessee, shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities and liabilities as if the income were income received by or accruing or in favour of him beneficially, and shall be liable to assessment in his own name in respect of that income ; but any such assessment shall be deemed to be made upon him in his representative capacity only,

A representative assessee by sub-section (1) of section 160 includes amongst others, the agent of a non-resident in respect of the income of a non-resident specified in section 9 (1) (i), and also a person who is treated as an agent under section 163. By sub-section (2) a representative assessee is deemed to be an assessee for the purpose of the Act. By section 162 the representative assessee, who as such pays any sum under the Act, may recover the sum so paid from the person on whose behalf it is paid. Section 163 (1) defines for the purposes of the Act an “agent” in relation to a non-resident. Resort to the machinery for assessing a representative assessee is however not obligatory : it is open to the Income-tax Officer to make a “direct assessment of the person on whose behalf or for whose benefit income therein referred to is receivable”, or to recover “from such person the tax payable in respect of such income.”

On regular assessment an agent of a non-resident is, by virtue of section 160 (1) read with section 163, liable to be assessed to tax and the tax so assessed may be recovered from him. The agent, if assessed to tax, has the right to recover tax paid by him from the person whom he represents : section 162. Since a non-resident is in respect of income which forms part of his total income liable to be assessed to tax, he may also be called upon to pay advance tax in respect of the income accruing to or received by him which forms part of his total income chargeable to tax by virtue of sections 4, 5 and 207. So far there is no dispute. Counsel for the company however urged that an agent of a non-resident may be assessed in regular assessment in respect of the income accruing or arising to his principal, but he cannot be called upon to pay advance tax even though he is by virtue of section 160 (2) deemed an assessee for the purposes of the Act. Diverse reasons were suggested in support of that argument. It was said that since under section 209 (1) the amount of advance tax payable by an assessee in the financial year is to be computed on his total income of the latest previous year in respect of which he has been assessed by way of regular assessment, an agent cannot be directed to pay advance tax the incidence of liability whereof depends upon the determination of total income of the principal. We fail to see any substance in this argument. Section 207 imposes liability for payment of advance tax, and section 208 prescribes the conditions of liability to pay advance tax. Determination of total income of the previous year of the assessee is not made a condition of the liability to pay advance tax. Advance tax payable by an assessee is computed in the manner provided by section 209 when the assessee has been previously assessed to tax. The Income-tax Officer is also enjoined by section 210

to issue a notice to a person who has been previously assessed "by way of regular assessment" to pay advance tax for the financial year. If the assessee has not been previously assessed by way of regular assessment, he is required by section 212 (3) to make an estimate of his total income—excluding capital gains—if it is likely to exceed the maximum amount not chargeable to tax by two thousand five hundred rupees. These provisions apply to all assessees. If an assessee is chargeable to tax in respect of his own income or income of others which is chargeable to tax as his own income, those provisions indisputably apply. It is expressly enacted by section 161 that as regards income in respect of which a person is a representative assessee, he shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities and liabilities as if the income were income received by or accruing to or in favour of him beneficially. It is clearly implicit therein that a representative assessee is not exempt from liability to pay advance tax. Of the liability to pay advance tax it is not predicated that the previous year should have come to an end before liability can arise. The previous year of an assessee may, in some cases end after the commencement but before the end of a financial year in which advance tax is payable: it may in other cases commence and end with the financial year. But the liability to pay advance tax is not in any manner affected because the previous year ends before or with the financial year. Where an assessee's previous year is the financial year, his total income may not be determined for the previous year before the commencement of the financial year, but on that account no exemption from payment of advance-tax is granted by the Act. On the commencement of a financial year, a person who is previously assessed to tax is liable to pay advance tax on demand by the Income-tax Officer under section 210. The quantum of tax will be determined by section 209 and will be adjusted in the manner provided by section 210 (3). That applies to every assessee whether the tax is liable to be paid by him on his own total income, or on the income assessed in his hands as a representative assessee. If he has not been previously assessed in the character in which he is liable to pay tax, an obligation is imposed by section 212 (3) upon him to make an estimate of his income and to pay advance tax. That provision applies to his own income and also to the income in respect of which he is a representative assessee. There is nothing in the Act under which the liability to pay advance tax of a representative assessee depends upon determination of the total income for the previous year.

An argument of hardship was also raised. It was said that an agent of a non-resident may not normally have in his possession any materials on which he may estimate the income in respect of which he may be chargeable to advance-tax, if he had not been previously assessed to tax as an agent of a non-resident. That again, in our judgment, is not a ground which exempts an agent from liability to pay advance tax on behalf of his principal. Liability to submit an estimate necessarily implies the duty to secure the requisite information from the non-resident for submitting the estimate. The tax, it must be remembered, is assessed on the agent for and on behalf of the principal, and the Act has made an express provision enabling the agent to recover from the principal the tax so paid by him. Once the Income-tax Officer treats a person as an agent of non-resident, liability to pay tax on regular assessment arises; and his liability as a representative assessee to pay advance tax is not excluded by any provision of the Act.

In our judgment, sections 207 and 208 which impose liability to pay advance tax in a financial year, section 210 which authorise the Income-tax Officer to make a demand for payment of advance tax from a person who is previously assessed, and section 212 (3) which imposes the duty to make an estimate of the total income likely to be received or to accrue or arise and to pay advance-tax if the total estimated income exceeds the maximum amount not chargeable to tax in his case by Rs. 2,500 apply to every person whether he is assessed in respect of his own income or as a representative assessee, and we are unable to imply an unexpressed limitation on the express words of the statute in favour of an agent of a non-resident principal.

THE ROLE OF LAW TEACHERS IN THE FUTURE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

By

SATYAVRATA PATEL, LL. M., Professor. Law Faculty Baroda University.

The role that a teacher can play in the future growth of International Law would be a limited one, but supreme within the limits. There are two powers that effect in their conjunction the desired changes in any situation, no less in law. One is the power that perceives the need of or conceives the changes, and the power that executes or implements those changes which it accepts. In old Indian sociological terms the Brahmin and the Kshatriya stand respectively for these. The Brahmin's instrument is the pen or the idea, and the Kshatriya's instrument is the weapon or the tool. And the teacher is the Brahmin, he can with his pen create an opinion which is supreme or tends to be supreme in the long run, if not immediately. Shelley, the English poet, has said. "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of mankind. With no less justice and justification an 18th century writer on International Law writes that a writer on International Law is the legislator of the future. It is this role that a teacher can best play in International Law. And perhaps for good, in the field of International Law, the teacher tends to be a jurist as well as the lawyer, or the role of all the three is rolled into one.

The teacher by his wise and patient labour, scientific and rational, and liberal and humanistic approach can suggest solutions to the chronic problems of our age, solutions at once just and fair, though indeed what is just and fair may remain a matter of deep controversy.

Law has to change with the changing needs of society, the new temper of the world. In rendering possible a right change, the teacher can create an atmosphere which is conducive to its ready acceptance.

As the statement principles laid down by the Bangkok Conference of International Commission of Jurists in 1965 reads :

"Law and lawyers are instruments of social order.....The law is not negative and unchanging.Order is important, but it must be an evolving order; the law must be firm yet flexible and capable of adopting itself to a changing world.

The lawyer has a deep moral obligation to uphold and advance the rule of the law in whatever spheres he may be engaged....."

The problems require the lawyer to play a vital role in their solution. The lawyer must look beyond the narrow confines of the law and gain understanding of the society in which he lives, so that he may play his part in its advancement.

Life is a continual growth, a constant flux and the challenges that life—here the life of International community—offers also change if not in kind at least in emphasis. In anticipating the change in making pre-fabricated solutions by constructive imagination he can indeed play an important part.

In providing anticipatory solutions which make the adjustments simpler, involving less frictions, in rendering the birth-pangs of a new international order or an international order based on wider justice or richer concept of justice less painful. He can be the midwife of the new order at the ideational level.

It may be said life is so new and changing that the search of justice is continual, almost unceasing, unending, that the role of a lawyer or law teacher would indeed remain as one of sharpening the tools of justice, deepening the quest of justice, in broadening its base, to make justice more realized in international affairs. The law-teacher is also a lawyer and the lawyer can by his understanding better help shape the future order. In laying the bricks of international order he can does have a role at the least of miner and the sapper. And when the order is fully operative of rightly implementing its mandates.

Sri Aurobindo, one of the greatest philosophers, has said, that before a thing becomes a reality it must be conceived in thought, in seed-form. In broadcasting that seed-form, making the ideal more easily acceptable to the large generality of mankind, in making the soil more ready for the realization of the ideal, the teacher's role can indeed be supreme. In several ways he can render this possible :

(1) By teaching he can influence human minds and if child is the father of man, he is influencing the future generations with his ideas and the ideas he sows shall germinate in the future.

(2) By writing on law and research in improving methods and institutions of law he can make his solutions acceptable to the world at large.

(3) He can create models for the future world law as Clark-Sohn, the model envisaged in 'World Peace through World Law, Harvard University' Press, 1964, as patterns for the future and comparing and contrasting the present with future of the ideal and suggesting the ways and means of bridging the gulf and of filling the lacuna.

(4) The idealists as Bhave or Gandhi type would tend to be soaring in the ethereal ideal ground ; the politician or the man of action who has decisions in his hands tends to be more crude in his approach. The wise-teacher can be mediator between the two. He may make the high-soaring idealism, an idealism with its legs more firmly implemented on the soil and at the same time make the crude realists or realities look to the ideas and make them less crude and try to widen its horizons and may make those with political decisions more amenable to higher influences, to larger vistas of justice or fair play.

The challenge to the teacher indeed is great. One does not know if he can rise to the challenge of the situation. But if he has the mettle, he has an opportunity.

The teacher may not have to teach but preach, may have to shed his ivory-tower isolation and not merely preach but work for it. The teacher has a certain detachment that helps him offer solutions, but he may have to fight for solutions when things acquire acute urgency or imperative importance.

The chief problem for the world law is depoliticising politics, to create binding legal norms where only power-politics or vested interests rule the roost. But in depoliticising the political decisions, the crucial decisions can only be taken by the politician. Therefore, he has to be persuaded for he cannot be coerced or cajoled even if one wills. In making the might subordinated to right, political powers to Dharma, the key role of a silent persuasion, persistent persuasion, tire-less propaganda can be performed by a law-teacher.

The Role of a teacher is of a propagandist, jurist, practical man of affairs, bricklayer of a right international order. As D. P. O. Connell has said :

" He must attain to some degree of abstraction in order to perceive the beginnings and ends of his subject and the relevance of the data to his acknowledged goal and to render explicit that which was implicit in the vital relationships of the peoples"¹

To realize the unrealised harmonies of law the international lawyer must play a creative role and for that he must as D. P. O. Connell says : He must be a historian, a linguist, a sociologist and a critic.²

He must be a historian, we may add, because he must have the total perspective, he must be a philosopher for he must have a vision which he wants to implement, he must be a sociologist for he must understand the social framework within which he has to act and uplift things he must be a critic for he must criticise the limitations of methods and institutions he or others use to reshape them to advantage; he must be a linguist for language is a delicate tool which he has to employ to effect in his search for an ideal order of things or achieving higher standards of international justice.

Certainly the teacher can play a very important role in resolving the tension between the actual and the ideal, in rendering more meaningful the dialogue between the present and the future ideal state of affairs in bridging the gap between them, in implementing the higher goals.

LIABILITY FOR INJURY OR DAMAGE CAUSED BY SPACE CRAFT

By

V. G. GOSWAMI, M.A.L.L.M.*

A problem much mooted by the first generation of space lawyers is that of liability for damage caused to life or property on earth, in air space, or in outer space by a space instrumentality through its falling, collision, explosion or the like.¹ In other words, the problem of compensation to third States is knocking at the doors of international jurists for its best and just solution.²

It would be difficult to find any aspect of space law as complex as that relating to the definition and delimitation of liability of States for space activities causing injury or damage to third States. The purpose of the present article is to study the problem in question from its various angles: Who should be liable? Whether liability should be joint or several? What type of interest is to be protected? What type of activity makes a State liable? What is proper machinery, if any to determine liability? What are the sanctions available to make a State bear the loss? What is the impact of Space treaty on the problem? These are some questions which have received varying answers under different municipal systems.³

The dangers and risks to life and property are present at every step in space exploration. In the event of unsuccessful launching, a space activity may result in destruction of the space instrumentality itself including astronauts or scientists handling it on one hand and damage or loss to person or property of a third State. In the case of Appollo-13 which missed attaining its prime objective of landing men on the moon, the mysterious accident that put its main electric supply out of action took place about 320,000 kilometres from earth as the craft was nearing the moon. A little disbalance of mind of the astronauts might have resulted in the sad death of all the astronauts. The disaster was avoided, however by the brilliant individual and team performances of the astronauts and the equally skilled and devoted men at mission control.⁴ Space travel still is, therefore in its early pioneering stage. However, the safe return of the Appollo-13 astronauts demonstrates man's increasing mastery over the domains surrounding the earth.⁵ Alterations are likely to be made in the electrical engineering system in order to avoid the Appollo-13 type explosion which occurred in a section where oxygen and hydrogen were stored.⁶ Swigert answered the newsman, "You are asking me whether I prayed. I certainly did, and I have no doubt that perhaps my prayers and the prayers of the rest of the people contributed an awful lot to us getting back".⁶ Thus it seems that success or failure of space venture depends on the kindness of the Supreme Power. Under the circumstances where there is every chance to cause damage or loss to person or property, the problem of compensation is of prime importance.

It is often suggested that the International Convention is the only solution to this problem⁷, and it has been observed, "The question of liability may be one of non-political subjects on which international agreement can be reached".⁸

1. Who should be liable?

Under this head, there are various relevant questions such as: Is liability to be assumed by the launching State, or the State that operates and controls the satellite or the State which supplied the finance, material and technical skill? Is liability to be joint or several? How much compensation is to be paid?

One may refer here to the draft convention put forward by the United States, at Geneva, in 1962, which contained provisions as under:

(a) States or international organizations responsible for the launching of Space vehicles should be liable internationally for personal injury, loss of life, or property damage caused thereby, whether such injury, loss of life, or property damage occurs on land, on the sea or in the air. (b) A claim based on personal injury, loss or damage caused by a space vehicle, should not require proof of fault on the part of the State or States or international organization responsible for launching the space vehicle in question, although the degree of care which reasonably ought to have been exercised by the person or entity on whose behalf claim is made, might properly be taken into account. (c) A claim may be presented internationally to the State or States or international organization responsible for the launching of a space vehicle causing exhaustion of any local remedies that may be available. (d) The presentation of claim should be made within a reasonable time after the occurrence of injury, loss, or damage. (e) The International Court of Justice should have jurisdiction to adjudicate on any dispute relating to the interpretation or application of international agreement on liability in the absence of an agreement between the States concerned on another means of settlement".⁹

In the sub-committee there was general agreement on principle (a) of the above draft resolution, but with respect to the principle of absolute liability, views were expressed that it would be difficult to prove fault or negligence in the case of space vehicles in contrast with air-craft, and that this principle could not be applied in all instances, for example, where two space vehicles collided".¹⁰

It would seem desirable that in cases where several States are involved, where for example, the State constructing and owning the space vehicle was not the same, as the launching State, one State should be held liable instead of an artificial arithmetical exercise being undertaken to allocate liability. As Prof. Cooper observed: "I happen to have been a rather careful student of the recently discussed proposed conventions on catastrophic damage caused by nuclear incidence; they deal with the problem on the basis of channelling the liability to a single entity to save much trouble. I would say without question that liability should be channelled as an international obligation to the State which has launched or authorised the launching of the space vehicle".¹¹

Such a proposition would seem to be in accordance with the views of many writers and States.¹² It has also been proposed that there should be some form of licensing between a State and private companies and that a State should still retain international responsibility for those activities which it had authorised.¹³

The Legal Sub-committee has been engaged in working out acceptable draft agreements on basic principles governing the activities of States in outer space, on liability for damage resulting from such activities and on rescue of astronauts and space-ships making emergency landings. In 1963, the Sub-committee produced an agreed text on the above subject, which was unanimously adopted in the form of a resolution by the General Assembly on 13th December, 1963.

Paragraph 5 of the resolution focussed attention on the legal liability or responsibility in operating space objects. It reads thus, "States bear international responsibility for national activities in Outer Space, whether carried on by governmental agencies or by non-governmental entities, and for assuring that national activities are carried on in conformity with the principles set forth in the present declaration. The activities of non-governmental entities in Outer Space shall require authorisation and continuing supervision by the State concerned. When activities are carried on in Outer Space by an international organization, responsibility for compliance with the principles set forth in this declaration shall be borne by the International Organization and by the State participating in it."¹⁴

Commenting on the provisions, Mr. Gardner observed: "The paragraph gave assurance to the Soviets and others that a State is responsible for the private space activities of its national as well as for public efforts carried on by the Government itself. Pursuant to the terms of the resolution, every State must take care that private activities are authorised and supervised by the State concerned".¹⁵

Para. 8 of the Resolution provides: "Each State which launches or procures the launching of an object into Outer Space, and each State from whose territory or facility, an object is launched, is internationally liable for the damage, to a foreign State or to its natural or juridical persons, by such object or its component parts on the earth, in the air space, or in outer space".¹⁶

Implementation of this principle will require not only a detailed express agreement setting forth substantive rights; there will be need also to make provision for international institutions to resolve such issues. It is expected that disputes of this kind can be settled through peaceful processes including recourse to diplomacy or the world Court.¹⁷ The view has also been advocated that each State might create a guarantee fund or otherwise bind itself to compensate its nationals who suffer damage upto a fixed minimum. The affected State should, then be able to proceed against the States, who in fact, caused the damage and so recover the money.¹⁸

Other writers favour the establishment of an 'international guarantee fund' to pay for damage caused by satellites, except where such damage was caused internationally. The view has been criticised on the ground of possible complications.¹⁹ One more difficulty, in such a case, may arise that many States may not be willing to contribute to such fund.

When the Legal Sub-committee began its third session in March, 1964, it had before it, in addition to a working paper on the unification of certain rules governing liability for damage caused by space devices introduced by Belgium in 1963, two other drafts concerning liability for damage caused by the launching of objects into Outer Space: a draft convention proposed by the United States and a draft agreement proposed by Hungary.²⁰

It may be correct to say that in this field, there has been progress. There is need for the establishment of an international institution to deal with the issues. If an international space authority or organisation is established, provision will have to be made in its constitutive instrument for capacity to sue and be sued for damage and injury caused by space craft. Such provision will be all the more necessary if the organisation has authority to launch satellite for the common benefit of its members.²¹

It is gratifying that an international space treaty on outer space has been concluded. It has embodied principles contained in Resolution 1962 (XVIII). It has provided that the State which launches or procures the launching of an object into Outer Space or from whose territory such object is launched, shall be internationally liable for any damage which may result therefrom²²

The liability will attach even where the activities are carried out by a non-governmental entity, which, however, is permitted to do so only under the authorisation and continuing supervision of the State concerned.²³ The Article also provides for activities carried out by International Organization, e.g. E.L.D.O., where there could be a combination of interests as far as the launching, owning, and controlling States are concerned. The Treaty in such cases provides for the joint and concurrent liability of the member States of its international organization and the organization itself.²⁴

The reference to the international organization has been specially made in view of the fact that countries with limited resources would be more inclined to participate in activities undertaken jointly through such organizations, e.g. in projects like the rocket sounding range at Thumba, in India.²⁵

On the matter of return of, and assistance to astronauts and space ships making emergency landings, Article VIII of the Space treaty provides that jurisdiction, control and ownership over objects launched into Outer Space or on personnel thereon, shall remain with the State on whose registry the object is carried. Therefore they shall be returned to that State, wherever they may be found, on furnishing identifying data.²⁵

Since activities in Outer Space are intended for the common benefit of all mankind the treaty emphasises the status of the astronauts as "envoys of mankind in Outer Space", with a corresponding obligation on all States to render all possible assistance in the event of accident, distress or emergency landing, and to return them promptly to the State registry of the space vehicle.¹

It is significant to note, that on these two subjects: liability for damage caused as a result of activities in space—and on assistance to and return of the astronauts and space crafts in distress, the treaty only presents the bare groundwork of the legal sub-committee which has been engaged in preparing two draft agreements to regulate them.²

The work of making rules regarding liability has been left to the Legal Sub-Committee, due to divergent views on the point. The Legal Sub-Committee is constantly working in this field and the laws relating to Outer Space are gradually taking shape.³ The United Nations had convened an International Conference in Vienna. The Conference had examined the practical benefits of space exploration and the opportunities available to non-space powers for international co-operation with special relevance to the needs of the developing countries.⁴

The U.S.S.R. representative said that the agreement on the rescue and the return of astronauts was of great importance, as also the proposed convention on liability for damage which might be caused by objects launched into outer space. The Outer Space Committee should now make every effort to have the convention apply not only to damages on earth and in the air but also in Outer Space.⁵

It follows from the above discussion that under the provisions of the Treaty concerning the Exploration of the Moon and other celestial bodies, viz., the Space Treaty of 1966, the question, 'who should be liable' seems to have been solved and rules relating to damages are under consideration.

2. Type of conduct giving rise to liability.

The next important question is relating to the nature of the liability. If injury, or damage is sustained while a space vehicle is being launched, or while it is in the air space or in outer space, should the criterion for liability be one of absolute liability or strict liability, or should it be based on the nature and character of the activity?

(a) Absolute liability.—A good number of writers favour a principle of absolute liability. Some are of the opinion that in any event it would seem to be an unfair burden to impose upon the person injured, the obligation to prove a defect or negligence in manufacture or in operation. Accordingly the principle of absolute or strict liability should be accepted.⁶ It has been observed: "One of two parties has to bear the consequences of an accident; it is reasonable that it should be the person whose negligence caused the accident rather than the victim".⁷

Russian writers do not appear to have dealt with this question. However, what small evidence is available indicates that they might not be opposed to a principle of absolute liability. As Mr. Korovin has observed: "It should be added that with launching objects into the cosmos (rockets, satellites, etc.) under present conditions being solely under the auspices of governmental bodies, full responsibility for eventual damage lies with the Government concerned in the event of personal or property losses for citizens of foreign countries."⁸ Analogy with the Soviet domestic law would also seem to support absolute liability for damage caused by Soviet space vehicles.⁹ The United Arab Republic¹⁰.

Japan¹¹ Great Britain¹² and the United States¹³ were all explicitly in favour of a principle of absolute liability at the Geneva conference. All the representatives felt the difficulty of proving fault or negligence in case of space vehicles as shown above. It may well be reasonable to hold that in such a case the operating States should each bear their own loss.¹⁴

The U. N. ad hoc Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space was of the view that if the above principle of absolute liability is adopted, no doubt the Rome Convention of 1952 on damage caused by foreign air-craft to third parties on the surface may prove of some value.¹⁵

When the space treaty was under consideration, Mr. Parthasarathi (India) also suggested that the principle of 'absolute liability' be embodied in the Treaty. It was felt, however, to be more advisable to leave the matter to the Legal Sub-Committee in view of divergent view points held by various countries on what the nature of liability in the present instance should be.¹⁶

(b) The principle of Strict liability.—The second possible solution is the principle of strict liability. Strict liability proceeds upon the theory that he who engages in an immensely hazardous activity, must bear responsibility for the risks, he thereby creates. The doctrine has long been established in Anglo-American Law in accordance with the leading case of *Rilands v. Fletcher*¹⁷, which held that one who keeps or operates a wild or uncontrolled instrumentality is absolutely liable for any damage caused to persons or property by the instrumentality.¹⁸ The liability here is by no means absolute. Winfield for instance, lists at least eight possible exceptions to this rule; some of them are consent of plaintiff, common benefit and Act of God, etc.¹⁹

According to some writers all the three draft agreements prepared by the United States, Hungary and Belgium, provide for a strict liability without fault. It is believed that at the present it would also be necessary to impose a strict liability on States for damage caused by activities carried out on the surface of a celestial body via Outer Space.²⁰ It is observed: "In the case of damage caused by activities carried out on the surface of a celestial body it should be based on fault except in the case when damage was done by an activity involving increased danger".²¹

(c) Liability based on Nature and Character of activity —A third suggestion is that liability for damage may well depend on the nature and character of the activity that is being pursued. If it is primarily of a military nature and for the benefit of one country, no doubt, liability should be absolute. If it is of a commercial nature and such as to benefit a large number of States, liability may well be imposed only for negligent conduct. Alternatively liability may be absolute, but State should be compensated from some International Fund to which all nations who might be benefited from the activity, should contribute. However, as has been indicated earlier, the unsolvable difficulty is to disengage a commercial from a military activity for this purpose.²²

It leads to the conclusion that a State is liable for damage caused. It may be submitted that the principle of absolute liability may serve in a better way. It is also submitted that compensation must be paid in proportion to the actual loss suffered.

3. Machinery for enforcement.

The real problem in this area is that of enforceability. If for some time only States will be responsible for launching space craft then any claim which is likely to arise would have to be prosecuted at the international level. In this respect, one may refer to the provisions in the American Draft Convention²³, that local remedies need not be exhausted, that claims should be made within a reasonable time and that the International Court of Justice should have jurisdiction to settle disputes. As it is apparent from the foregoing discussion that Mr. Christol is also of the opinion that disputes of this kind can be settled through peaceful processes including recourse to diplomacy or world Court. Other processes available include enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means selected by disputants.²⁴ With the establishment of an international liability, it becomes the duty of States to conform their national laws to facilitate the standard.

A small number of incidents have already arisen which might well have involved questions of liability. The seriousness of this problem can be seen in the abortive launching of a powerful U. S. rocket designed to place a navigational satellite into orbit. The flight miscarried and parts of the craft landed in Cuba.²⁵ Another occurrence has been reported, that a fragment from a Russian sputnik which fell on U. S. territory has been returned to the Soviet Union¹

As to the settlement of disputes, some delegates suggested that arbitration should be envisaged. Some other delegates suggested that the establishing of a special tribunal to settle the amount of compensation payable for damage caused, be studied. Some representatives advocated that the jurisdiction of International Court of Justice should be extended to cases involving space vehicle accidents only when the parties to the dispute consented.²

Commenting on paragraph 8 of the Resolution 1962 (XVIII), Mr. Christol observed: "This provision of the Resolution sought only to deal with liability situations, and as time goes on there will be much additional effort dedicated to the formulation of a detailed code on damages".³

It may be noted that the Space treaty has embodied provisions relating to liability but is silent on the machinery for enforcement. It has presented the bare groundwork of the Legal Sub-Committee. The Legal Sub-Committee of the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space concluded its eighth session on 4th July, with the adoption of the report to its parent body. The session began on 9th June, 1969 in Geneva.⁴ It was devoted to a consideration of a draft agreement on liability for damage caused by objects launched into Outer Space, and to the study of questions relative to the definition of Outer Space and to the utilization of Outer Space and Celestial Bodies, including the various implications of space communications. The matter of a draft agreement on liability had been on the Sub-Committee's agenda for the past five years. At the present session five proposed texts for the draft agreement were considered which were submitted respectively by Belgium, Hungary, India, Italy and the United States. Also considered were the formulations of principles as worked out at informal consultations held in New Delhi last March among various delegations which concentrated on five major outstanding issues with respect to the draft agreement. These were: International organizations, applicable law, settlement of claims, ceiling on liability and nuclear damage. The Sub-committee also took up proposals on individual articles and provisions submitted by the various delegations.⁵

The Sub-committee reached agreement on formulations of certain principles relating to the law applicable to compensation for damage caused by objects launched into Outer Space as follows:

(1) The compensation which the respondent State shall be required to pay for the damage under this convention shall be determined in accordance with International Law;

(2) if there is agreement on the applicable law between the claimant and the respondent, then that law should be applied.⁶

The agreement on the second formulation was a reaffirmation of a principle approved by the Sub-committee at its last session. The Sub-committee also agreed provisionally on two points concerning the relationship between the agreement on liability and International Organizations as follows:

(1) International Organizations that launch objects into Outer Space, should be liable under the convention for damage caused by such activities;

(2) if damage is caused by a space object to the property of an international inter-governmental organization, the claim should be presented by one of the States-members of the international inter-governmental organization which are parties to this convention.⁷

The Sub-committee decided to reflect in its report to the Outer Space Committee that no agreement was reached on the question whether the liability of the States-members of the international organization that were parties to the liability convention, (a) should be residual and arise only in the event of default by the international organization, or (b) should arise at the same time as the liability of the international organization. Nor was agreement reached on other aspects of the question of the rights of International Organizations under the convention. The Sub-committee noted that this problem required further consideration.⁸

A series of Articles of the draft agreement on liability were considered and approved by the Working Group of the whole committee. According to the latter's decision, the Working Group was set up in order that Articles pertaining to non-controversial problems, other than the five outstanding issues, could be decided and acted upon. The Articles approved by the Working Group, and subsequently by the Sub-committee, come under the following sections of the agreement: field of applications and exemptions from provisions of agreement; question of absolute liability; presentation of claims by States or international organizations and in respect of natural or juridical persons; presentation of claims for compensation through diplomatic channels; pursuit of remedies available to respondent State or other international agreements; time-limits for presentation of claims; and question of joint liability. Agreement was also reached on a number of definitions, namely 'damage' 'launching', and 'launching state'.⁹

Necessary steps should be taken towards the establishment of a suitable machinery for enforcement. There may be two suggestions in this respect : First, the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice should be extended to adjudicate on such disputes, even where only one party to such a dispute refers any such matter to it, or secondly, a separate machinery should be established equipped with power to adjudicate on matters like, liability of State, joint liability of States in appropriate cases, amount of compensation, and to provide any other remedies in appropriate situations. It should be under direct control and supervision of the United Nations so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The problem of liability for injury or damage caused by spacecraft is not beyond control in the world arena of today. The Legal Sub-Committee has made marked success in this field. It may be expected that in the near future, if space powers pay proper attention to this problem, a detailed code on damages would be finalised and proper remedies will be available in all cases where injury or damage is caused by a space object to any person or property of a state or international organization.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 133 (1) (a) and (b)—When attracted.

In order that a certificate may be issued by the High Court for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court under clause (a) of Article 133 (1) of the Constitution, it is one of the conditions that the value of the subject-matter in dispute in the Court of first instance and still in dispute on appeal in the Supreme Court is not less than Rs. 20,000. A certificate under clause (b) may be granted if the judgment, decree or final order involves a claim or question relating to property of the like amount or value. A claim in a petition challenging the validity of a notice to show cause why a person in the public service shall not be dismissed or removed from service is not capable of valuation and can in no event be regarded as of a value not less than Rs. 20,000. A certificate under Article 133 (1) (a) or (b) to appeal to the Supreme Court against such an order would therefore be incompetent.

In such a case a concession by the Counsel that the valuation was not less than Rs. 20,000 will not invest the High Court with jurisdiction to grant a certificate under clause (a) or (b) of Article 133 (1).

Constitution of India (1950), Article 134 (1) (c)—Certificate under—When may be granted.

It is manifest that before granting a certificate under Article 134 (1) (c) of the Constitution the High Court must be satisfied that it involves some substantial question of law or principle. The certificate itself should give an indication what substantial question of law or principle is involved in the appeal to bring it within the scope of Article 134 (1) (c). Where the Supreme Court finds that the certificate is not in compliance with the requirements of Article 134 (1) (c), it can decline to accept the certificate. There are instances, however, where the Supreme Court after declining to accept the certificate has allowed the appellant to apply under Article 136 of the Constitution in proper cases.

In the present case the certificate did not indicate any reason as to why the High Court granted it. Hence the Supreme Court declined to accept the certificate.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), section 116-A (3)—Appeal under—Computation of period of limitation—Applicability of sections 4 and 12 of Limitation Act (XXXVI of 1963).

Election petition—Proof of corrupt practice—Giving of benefit of doubt—Discretion of Court.

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), sections 90 (5), 77, 123 (6) and 99—Scope.

By virtue of section 29 (2) of the Limitation Act, 1963, sections 4 and 12 thereof apply to an appeal under section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act and hence if such an appeal is filed on the date on which the Court re-opens after the summer recess it will be regarded as within time if the period of limitation prescribed under section 116-A (3) of the Representation of the People Act, after taking into account the time requisite for obtaining a certified copy of the order appealed from, had expired during the course of the recess.

In an election petition a corrupt practice may be proved only by evidence which establishes the case beyond reasonable doubt. But in giving the benefit of doubt the Court has to reach a judicial conclusion. It cannot vacillate.

The words of clause (5) of section 90 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 are clear. The Tribunal has no power to allow any amendment of the election petition so as to supply or introduce particulars of a corrupt practice not alleged in the petition. But the particulars of the corrupt practice alleged in the petition may in appropriate cases be permitted to be introduced by amendment.

In the present case by the impugned amendment particulars of corrupt practice previously alleged in the petition were introduced and not particulars of a corrupt practice not previously set up in the petition. The High Court was therefore right in allowing the amendments to be made.

Held on facts, that the High Court was right in its conclusion that the returned candidate had spent an amount which exceeded the amount permissible under section 77 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, and so was guilty of a corrupt practice under section 123 (6) and that therefore his election was void under section 100 (1) (b) of the Act.

Under section 99 of the Representation of the People Act the Court has no discretion in the matter, if it was of the view that any person is proved at the trial to have been guilty of any corrupt practice, not to name that person. The duty under the Act is cast on the Court or the Tribunal and on the ground that the party has not applied for a notice, the High Court could not avoid the obligation imposed by statute to take proceeding under section 99 against the person proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practice and to name him.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 311—Government servant transferred from one department to another—Authority competent to dismiss him from service—Delegation of power of dismissal to head of transferee department—Legality.

If a person is a member of the service and he is transferred from one department to another it is not necessary that he should be re-appointed to the service or he should be appointed to the department to which he is transferred. As soon as he is transferred permanently he begins to hold the permanent post which he starts holding in the transferee department and the appointing authority for the transferee department would be competent to dismiss him from service.

Assuming that the respondent in the instant case had not been permanently transferred from the Irrigation Department to the Office of the Development Commissioner (Planning Department), even then the Development Commissioner was entitled to dismiss him by virtue of various orders of Government. The order, dated 21st May, 1958, clearly placed the control over the entire staff on deputation from the Irrigation Department to the Planning Department with the Development Commissioner. The word "control" is a wide word and includes disciplinary jurisdiction. In the context there is no doubt that it was the intention to give disciplinary jurisdiction over the entire staff on deputation to the Development Commissioner. There is nothing in the Constitution which debars the Government from conferring powers on an officer other than the appointing authority to dismiss a Government servant provided he is not subordinate in rank to the appointing officer or authority.

Whether a person has a lien in one department or in other department, the Government is entitled, subject to the provisions of Article 311 (1) of the Constitution, to delegate power of dismissal to any officer.

It is impossible to hold on the language of the definition of "scheduled building" contained in section 2 (h) of the East Punjab Urban Rent Restriction Act, that the original purpose of the tenancy is decisive of the question whether it is a scheduled building. In terms it is enacted that a residential building will be deemed to be a scheduled building if it is used by a person engaged in one or more of the specified professions, partly for the business and partly for his residence. The Court below (the High Court of Punjab) was therefore not right in holding that the house which was let out for residential purposes could not, at the option of the tenant, be converted into a scheduled building.

The finding of the High Court, that the user of the building by the tenant for professional purposes was casual cannot also be supported.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 136—Appeal under in a criminal case—Interference with question of sentence by Supreme Court—Practice.

Merely because the helpless victim of rape was frightened into resignation and non-resistance in the face of inevitable compulsion, it cannot be considered as a mitigating circumstance for awarding a lenient sentence.

The two appellants were convicted for both the offences under sections 366 and 376 of the Penal Code. After the amendment of section 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in 1923 a person convicted of two or more offences (which may not be distinct) at one trial is liable to be sentenced to the several punishments prescribed therefor subject of course to the provisions of section 71, Indian Penal Code. This aspect may therefore legitimately be kept in view when considering whether the sentence imposed in this case is excessive. (Sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100 for both the offences was held not to be excessive in the circumstances of the case.)

Further, it has to be borne in mind that the question of sentence is normally a matter of judicial discretion of the trial Court and the Supreme Court on appeal by Special Leave does not, as a rule, interfere with the exercise of such discretion.

It is clear that the law in force at the material time viz., Pawai Rules, 1934 and the Rewa State Land Revenue and Tenancy Code, 1935, contained specific provisions that the Durbar could exempt any estate from payment of land revenue. The trial Court and two judges of the High Court held that the Maharaja, by means of an order, dated 18th March, 1948, had made such an exemption in the case of Anandgarh Estate. This finding is unexceptionable on the facts and circumstances including the evidence in the present case.

It is true that there is a well-recognised distinction between the legislative and executive acts in regard to the orders issued by absolute rulers and that whenever a dispute arose as to whether an order passed by an absolute ruler of an Indian State represented a legislative act all relevant factors were considered before the question was answered. These relevant factors were, the nature of the order, the scope and effect of its provisions, its general setting and context, etc. But in the present case the order made by the Durbar was under legislative sanction inasmuch as it was made in terms of the provisions of statutory rules and the Rewa Land Revenue and Tenancy Code. It cannot therefore be contended that the exemption granted in respect of Anandgarh Estate was merely an executive act which would not be binding on the Successor State.

There is no rule that the High Court will not try issues of fact in a writ petition. In each case the Court has to consider whether the party seeking relief has an alternative remedy which is equally efficacious by a suit, whether refusal to grant relief in a writ petition may amount to denying relief, whether the claim is based substantially upon consideration of evidence oral and documentary of a complicated nature and whether the case is otherwise fit for trial in exercise of the jurisdiction to issue high prerogative writs.

In the present case the High Court did not call upon the State to file a reply affidavit and did not consider whether the facts raised were so complicated or that for other reasons it would be inappropriate to try the dispute in the writ petition. Madras Hindu (Bigamy Prevention and Divorce) Act (VI of 1949)—Applicability—Pleading and proof.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), section 112—Birth during subsistence of valid marriage—Presumption.

A person may be a Hindu by birth or by conversion. A mere theoretical allegiance to the Hindu faith by a person born in another faith does not convert him into a Hindu, nor is a bare declaration that he is a Hindu sufficient to be converted to the Hindu faith. But such an intention accompanied by conduct unequivocally expressing that intention may be sufficient evidence of conversion. No formal ceremony of purification or expiation is necessary to effectuate conversion.

The evidence in the present case clearly establishes that the 'parents of A, an Indian Christian, arranged her marriage with P, a Hindu. The marriage was performed according to Hindu rites and ceremonies in the presence of relatives who were invited to attend. Customary ceremonies peculiar to a marriage between Hindus were performed: no objection was raised to the marriage and after the marriage A was accepted by the local Hindu Nadar community as belonging to the Hindu faith, and the son born to her was also treated as a Hindu. On the evidence there can be no doubt that A bona fide intended to contract marriage with P. Absence of specific expiatory or purificatory ceremonies will not be sufficient to hold that she was not converted to Hinduism before the marriage ceremony was performed. The fact that P chose to go through the marriage ceremony according to Hindu rites with A in the presence of large number of persons clearly indicates that he accepted that A was converted to Hinduism before the marriage ceremony was performed. Hence the marriage is valid.

It cannot be held, in the absence of a specific plea and issue raised to that end, that a person was domiciled in the State of Madras and was on that account governed by the provisions of the Madras Hindu (Bigamy Prevention and Divorce) Act, 1949.

If it be accepted that there was a valid marriage between P and A and during the subsistence of the marriage the plaintiff was Lorn, a conclusive presumption arises that he was the son of P, unless it be established that at the time when the plaintiff was conceived, P had no access to A.

Criminal Trial—Confessions and retracted confessions—Evidentiary value of.

The law as to confessions is perhaps too widely stated. Confessions can be acted upon if the Court is satisfied that they are voluntary and that they are true. The voluntary nature of the confessions depends upon whether there was any threat, inducement or promise and its truth is judged in the context of the entire prosecution case. The confession must fit into the proved facts and not run counter to them. When the voluntary character of the confession and its truth are accepted it is safe to rely on it. Indeed a confession, if it is voluntary and true and not made under any inducement or threat or promise, is the most potent piece of evidence against the maker. Retracted confession, however, stands on a slightly different footing. As the Privy Council once stated, in India it is the rule to find a confession and to find it retracted later. A Court may take into account the retracted confessions, but it must look for the reasons for the making of the confession as well as for its retraction, and must weigh the two to determine whether the retraction affects the voluntary nature of the confession or not. If the Court is satisfied that it was retracted because of an after-thought or advice, the retraction may not weigh with the Court if the general facts proved in the case and the tenor of the confession as made and the circumstances of its making and withdrawal warrant its user. All the same, the Courts do not act upon retracted confession without finding assurance from some other source as to the guilt of the accused. Therefore, it can be stated that a true confession made voluntarily may be acted upon with slight evidence to corroborate it, but a retracted confession requires the general assurance that the retraction was an after-thought and that the earlier statement was true.

Civil Procedure Code (V of 1908), section 47—Execution of decree—Objection on the ground that Court which passed the decree had no jurisdiction—If may be raised before the executing Court.

A Court executing a decree cannot go behind the decree : between the parties or their representatives it must take the decree according to its tenor, and cannot entertain any objection that it is incorrect in law or in facts. Until it is set aside by an appropriate proceeding in appeal or revision, a decree even if it be erroneous is still binding between the parties.

When a decree which is a nullity, for instance where it is passed without bringing the legal representatives on the record of a person who was dead at the date of the decree, or against a ruling prince without a certificate, is sought to be executed an objection in that behalf may be raised in a proceeding for execution. Again, when the decree is made by a Court which has no inherent jurisdiction to make it, objection as to its validity may be raised in an execution proceeding if the objection appears on the face of the record : where the objection as to the jurisdiction of the Court to pass the decree does not appear on the face of the record and requires examination of the questions raised and decided at the trial or which could have been but have not been raised, the executing Court will have no jurisdiction to entertain an objection as to the validity of the decree even on the ground of absence of jurisdiction.

Thus, if the decree is on the face of the record without jurisdiction and the question does not relate to the territorial jurisdiction or under section 11 of the Suits Valuation Act, objection to the jurisdiction of the Court to make the decree may be raised : where it is necessary to investigate facts in order to determine whether the Court which had passed the decree had no jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit, the objection cannot be raised in the execution proceeding.

Hindu Law—Adoption—Essentials—Proof.

For an adoption to be valid under the Hindu law, there must be a formal ceremony of giving and taking. This is true of the regenerate castes as well as of the Sudras. Although no particular form is prescribed for the ceremony, the law requires that the natural parent should hand over the adoptive boy and the adoptive parent must receive him, the nature of the ceremony varying according to the circumstances.

It is true that it is well settled that a person who seeks to displace the natural succession to property by alleging an adoption must discharge the burden that lies upon him by proof of the factum of adoption and its validity. But in the case of an ancient adoption evidence showing that the boy was treated for a long time as the adopted son at a time when there was no controversy, is sufficient to prove the adoption although evidence of actual giving and taking is not forthcoming.

In the case of all ancient transactions, it is but natural that positive oral evidence will be lacking. Passage of time gradually wipes out such evidence. Human affairs often have to be judged on the basis of probabilities. Rendering of justice will become impossible if a particular mode of proof is insisted upon under all circumstances. In judging whether an adoption pleaded has been satisfactorily proved or not, we have to bear in mind the lapse of time between the date of the alleged adoption and the date on which the concerned party is required to adduce proof. In the case of an adoption said to have taken place years before the same is questioned, the most important evidence is likely to be that the alleged adoptive father held out the person claiming to have been adopted as his son ; the latter treated the former as his father and their relations and friends treated them as father and son. There is no pre-determined way of proving a fact. A fact is said to have been proved where after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes it to exist or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it exists. Hence if after taking an overall view of the evidence adduced in the case, the Court is satisfied that the adoption pleaded is true, it must necessarily proceed on that basis, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that it is a valid adoption as well.

In the present case by order, dated 25th February, 1965, for the assessment year 1964-65 the company was treated as an agent of the non-resident principal. Since the company was treated as an agent of the non-resident it became liable to pay advance tax in the financial year 1964-65. By virtue of section 207 read with section 208 the declaration that the company was an agent involved liability to pay advance-tax as well as tax assessed on regular assessment. We are unable to hold that the liability to pay advance tax did not arise against the company.

The plea that the provisions imposing liability to pay advance tax upon an agent of a non-resident infringe the equality clause of the Constitution has no substance. As already observed, the liability to pay advance tax arises under sections 207 and 208 and its quantum is determined by sections 209, 210 and 212 (3), and it is not predicated of the accrual of liability that the total income of the previous year should be ascertained or precisely ascertainable when demand is made by the Income-tax Officer under section 210, or when the assessee is required to make an estimate. The assumption that an assessee whose year of account coincides with the financial year is not in respect of that year liable to pay advance tax is not warranted. The computation of advance tax is not dependent upon the completion of the previous year : it depends upon the rules prescribed by sections 209, 210 and 212. Every person who has been previously assessed to tax is liable when ordered by the Income-tax Officer to pay advance tax, subject to the right to make an estimate under section 212 (1). A person who has not been previously assessed but whose income is likely to exceed the specified amount is also liable to pay advance tax. The Act does not accord discriminatory treatment between different assessees. Payment of advance tax is on account and is always liable to be adjusted against the tax assessed on regular assessment. That again applies to all assessees. It is then difficult to appreciate the grounds on which the plea of denial of equal protection may be sustained. The only ground urged, that an assessee may escape liability to pay advance tax where his previous year coincides with the financial year, is without substance, and no other ground is set up in support of the plea of violation of the guarantee of equality under Article 14 of the Constitution.

The petition therefore fails and is dismissed with costs.

(Civil Appellate Jurisdiction.)

PRESENT :—J. C. SHAH, Acting C. J., V. RAMASWAMI AND A. N. GROVER, JJ.

State of Kerala

v.

A. B. Abdul Kadir and others

Luxury Tax on Tobacco (Validation) Act, 1964 (IX of 1964) and Constitution of India (1950), Articles 301 and 304 (a)—Prohibition imposed by article 301 when attracted—Every case must be judged on its own facts and circumstances—Duty of High Court.

It is well-established by numerous authorities of this Court that only such restrictions or impediments which directly or immediately impede the free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse fall within the prohibition imposed by Article 301. A tax may in certain cases directly and immediately restrict or hamper the flow of trade, but every imposition of tax does not do so. Every case must be judged on its own facts and in its own setting of time and circumstance. In the present case the High Court has not gone into the question whether the provisions of Act IX of 1964 and the notification dated 25th

* C.A. No. 517 of 1967.

January, 1951, issued under the Cochin Tobacco Act constitute such restrictions or impediments as directly and immediately hamper free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse and, therefor, fall within the prohibition imposed under Article 301 of the Constitution. Unless the High Court first comes to the finding on the available material whether or not there is infringement after guarantee under Article 301 of the Constitution, the further question as to whether the statute is saved under Article 304 (b) does not arise and the principle laid down by this Court in Kalyani stores case, (1966) 1 S.C.R. 865: (1966) 2 S.C.J. 367, cannot be invoked.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order dated the 3rd October, 1966 of the Kerala High Court in Original Petition No. 934 of 1964.

M. R. K. Pillai, Advocate for Appellant.

R. Gopalakrishnan, Advocate, for Respondents.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ramaswami, J.—This appeal is brought by certificate from the judgment of the Kerala High Court in O. P. No. 934 of 1964.

The respondents are dealers in tobacco and tobacco preparation and are doing business in Mattancherry in the name and style of A. S. Bava, Tobacco. In the year 1909, Cochin Tobacco Act (VII of 1084 (M.E.)) was enacted by the Maharaja of Cochin. Section 4 of that Act prohibited the transport, import of export, sale and cultivation of tobacco except as permitted by the Act and Rules framed thereunder. Section 5 of the Act gave power to the Dewan to make rules from time to time consistent with the Act, to permit absolutely or subject to any condition the possession for sale, or cultivation of tobacco. In pursuance of the power given by this section the Dewan was making rules from time to time relating to the matters specified in the Act. Cochin State was integrated with Travancore on 1st April, 1950 in order to form the new State of Travancore-Cochin. On that date, after the Constitution came into force the State of Travancore-Cochin became a Part B State and by the Finance Act, 1950, the Central Excise and Salt Act (I of 1944) was extended to the Travancore-Cochin State. Section 13 (2) of the Act provided that if immediately before the first day of April, 1950 there was in force in any State other than Jammu and Kashmir a law corresponding to, but other than, an Act referred to in sub-section (1) or (2) of section 11, such law was repealed with effect from such date. In consequence of this provision in the Finance Act, rules which were in force on 1st April, 1950 were changed in Cochin and by a notification dated 3rd August, 1950, the system of auction sales of A and B Class shops was done away with and instead graded licence fees were introduced for various clauses of licences including 'C' class licences. The State of Travancore-Cochin was collecting licence fee from the respondents for the period from 17th August, 1950 to 31st December, 1957 on the strength of the said rules framed by the Travancore-Cochin State. In 1956 the respondents filed O. P. No. 70 of 1956 in the High Court of Kerala for the refund of the licence fee collected after 1st April, 1950 on the ground that the Cochin Tobacco Act stood repealed by the Finance Act, 1950 because of the extension of the Central Excise and Salt Act (I of 1944) to the Part B State of Travancore-Cochin and in consequence the notifications issued in August, 1950 and January, 1951 framing new rules for the issue of licences and prescribing fees therefor under the powers conferred by the Cochin and Travancore Acts were ab initio void because the Acts under which the notifications were purported to be issued stood repealed from 1st April, 1950. The petition was opposed by the appellant on the ground that the Act and the rules were not repealed by the extension of the Central Excise and Salt Act (I of 1944) to Travancore-Cochin State. The High Court dismissed the writ petition holding that the tax levied by virtue of the rules framed under the Travancore-Cochin Tobacco Acts was not a duty of excise coming within the Union List but it was a tax on luxuries coming within Entry 62 of the State List. The respondents took the matter in appeal to this Court which held that the rules framed under the Cochin Tobacco Act of 1084 (M.E.) and the Travancore Tobacco Regulation of 1087 (M.E.) requiring licences to be taken out for storage and sale of tobacco and for payment of licence fee in respect thereof were law corresponding to the provisions of the Central Excise and Salt Act, 1944 and hence were superseded on 1st April, 1950 by virtue of section 13 (2) of the Finance Act, 1950. Consequently, the new rules framed in August, 1950 and January, 1951 for the respective areas of Cochin and Travancore for the issue of licences and payment of fee for storage of tobacco were invalid ab initio. The Court did not consider it necessary to decide whether the Cochin and Travancore Acts were within the competence of the State Legislature under Entry 62 of List II for that question would only arise if those Acts were not repealed as corresponding law under section 13 (2) of the Finance Act.

Soon after the decision of this Court the respondents complained to the appellant that a sum of Rs. 1,11,750 had been illegally collected as licence fee from 1125 to 1133 (M.E.). On 29th April, 1962, the appellant refunded a sum of Rs. 73,500 but did not return the balance.

On 16th December, 1963, the Government of Kerala promulgated Ordinance I of 1963 which was later replaced by Act IX of 1964. The Ordinance was promulgated in order to avoid the effect of the decision of this Court in *A. B. Abdul Kadir and others v. The State of Kerala*¹ in respect of the period from 17th August, 1950 to 31st December, 1957. Section 3 of the Act provides:

“For the period beginning with the 17th day of August, 1950 and ending on the 31st day of December, 1957 every person vending or stocking tobacco within any area to which this Act extends shall be liable and shall be deemed always to have been liable to pay a luxury tax on such tobacco in the form of a fee for licence for the vend and stocking of the tobacco, at such rates as may be prescribed not exceeding the rates specified in the schedule.”

Section 4 confers rule-making power and states:

“(1) The Government may, by notification in the Gazette, make rules to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(2) In particular, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such rules may provide for:—

- (i) the prohibition of the vending of tobacco except under a licence;
- (ii) the issue of licences for the vend and stocking of tobacco and the procedure therefor;
- (iii) Classification of licences and the rate at which tax in the form of a fee for licence may be levied for each class of licences;
- (iv) appeals from orders under the rules.

(3) The rules and notifications specified below purported to have been issued under the Tobacco Act of 1087 (Travancore Act I of 1087) or the Cochin Tobacco Act VII of 1084 as the case may be, in so far as they relate or purport to relate to the levy and collection of fees for licences for the vend and stocking of tobacco, shall be deemed to be rules issued under this section and shall be deemed to have been in force at all material times.”

* * *

Section 5 provides:

"Notwithstanding any judgment, decree or order of any Court, all fees for licences for the vend or stocking of tobacco levied or collected or purported to have been levied or collected under any of the rules or notifications specified in sub-section (3) of section 4 of the period beginning with the 17th day of August, 1950 and ending on the 31st day of December, 1957 shall be deemed to have been validly levied or collected in accordance with law as if this Act were in force on and from the 17th day of August, 1950 and the fees for licences were a luxury tax on tobacco levied under the provisions of this Act and accordingly (a) no suit or other proceeding shall be maintained or continued in any Court for the refund of any fees, paid or purported to have been paid under any of the said rules or notifications;

and

(b) no Court shall enforce a decree or order directing the refund of any fees paid or purported to have been paid under any of the said rules or notification."

Section 6 enacts:

"Where any amount paid or purported to have been paid as a fee for licence under any of the rules or notifications specified in sub-section (3) of section 4 has been refunded after the 24th day of January, 1962 and such amount would not have been liable to be refunded if this Act had been in force on the date of the refund, the person to whom the refund was made shall pay the amount so refunded to the credit of the Government in any Government treasury on or before the 16th day of April, 1964 where such amount is not so paid, the amount may be recovered from him as an arrear of land revenue under the Revenue Recovery Act for the time being in force."

The notification dated 25th January, 1951, issued under the Cochin Tobacco Act of 1984 reads as follows:

"In exercise of the powers conferred by section 5 of the Cochin Tobacco Act VII of 1984 as subsequently amended and as continued in force by the Travancore-Cochin Administration and application of Laws Act VI of 1125 and in supersession of all previous notifications and Rules on the subject, the following rules are prescribed under sanction of His Highness the Raj Pramukh for the import, export, sale, transport, possession, disposal of things confiscated and the grant of rewards under the said Act and for generally carrying out the provisions thereof.

Clause 16:

"(i) Holders (stockist or 'A' Class licences shall be entitled to purchase tobacco from any dealer within or without the State without any quantitative restriction. This class of licences shall sell only to other 'A' Class licencees or to 'B' class licencees.

(ii) the annual fees for these licencees shall be as follows :

Variety of tobacco stocked	Maximum quantity Cds	Minimum fee prescribed Rs.	Fee payable for stocking additional quantities Rs.
A. Jaffna tobacco	100	1500	Rs. 100 for additional quantity of 100 Cds or fraction thereof
B. Tobacco produced in India (Mfd.)	100	1000	Rs. 750 do
C. Bædi or Bædi tobacco	25	1000	Rs. 750 for additional quantity of 25 Cds or fraction thereof.
D. Tobacco preparation of all kinds	to the value of 20,000	1000	Rs. 750 for additional quantity to the value of Rs. 20,000 or fraction thereof.

N.B.—For the purpose of calculating stockist licence fee in respect of tobacco preparations, the cost price of the article will be taken into account. The licence fee will be realised only for the quantities brought in from outside the State.”

After the enactment of Act IX of 1964, the appellant made a demand on the respondent to repay the amount of Rs. 73,500 which had been refunded to the respondent in accordance with the Supreme Court judgment. Thereupon the respondent filed writ petition O.P. No. 934 of 1964 which was allowed by the High Court on the ground that Act IX of 1964 and the rules were ultra vires the Constitution of India.

It was held by the High Court that in the absence of any production of tobacco inside the Kerala State it was not competent for the Kerala Legislature to impose a tax on tobacco imported from outside the State and therefore the provisions of the Luxury Tax on Tobacco (Validation Act) 1964 violated the guarantee contained in Articles 301 and 304 of the Constitution. In reaching this conclusion the High Court purported to follow the decision of this Court in *Kalyani Stores v. The State of Orissa*¹.

It is necessary at this stage to set out the relevant Articles in Part XIII of the Constitution as it stood at the material times :

“Article 301 :

Subject to the other provisions of this part, trade, commerce and intercourse throughout the territory of India shall be free.

Article 302 :

“Parliament may by law impose such restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse between one State and another or within any part of the territory of India as may be required in the public interest.”

Article 304 :

“Notwithstanding anything in Article 301 or Article 303, the Legislature of a State may by law :

(a) impose on goods imported from other States (or the Union territories) any tax to which similar goods manufactured or produced in that State are subject, so, however, as not to discriminate between goods so imported and goods so manufactured or produced; and

(b) impose such reasonable restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse with or within that State as may be required in the public interest :

Provided that no Bill or amendment for the purposes of clause (b) shall be introduced or moved in the Legislature of a State without the previous sanction of the President.”

The true scope and effect of these Articles was the subject-matter of consideration in *Atiabari Tea Co., Ltd. v. The State of Assam*¹. The majority view was expressed by Gajendragadkar, J. at page 860 as follows :

“In construing Article 301 we must, therefore, have regard to the general scheme of our Constitution as well as the particular provisions in regard to taxing laws. The construction of Article 301 should not be determined on a purely academic or doctrinaire considerations; in construing the said Article we must adopt a realistic approach and bear in mind the essential features of the separation of powers on which our Constitution rests. It is a federal constitution which we are interpreting, and so the impact of Article 301 must be judged accordingly. Besides, it is not irrelevant to remember in this connection that the Article we are construing imposes a constitutional limitation on the power of the Parliament and State Legislatures to levy taxes, and generally, but for such limitation, the power of taxation would be presumed to be for public good and would not be subject to judicial review or scrutiny. Thus considered we think it would be reasonable and proper to hold that restrictions freedom from which is guaranteed by Article 301, would be such restrictions as directly and immediately restrict or impede the free flow or movement of trade. Taxes may and do amount to restrictions; but it is only such taxes as directly and immediately restrict trade that would fall within the purview of Article 301. The argument that all taxes should be governed by Article 301 whether or not their impact on trade is immediate or mediate, direct or remote, adopts, in our opinion, an extreme approach which cannot be upheld. If the said argument is accepted it would mean, for instance, that even a legislative enactment prescribing the minimum wages to industrial employees may fall under Part XIII because in an economic sense an additional wage bill may indirectly affect trade or commerce. We are, therefore, satisfied that in determining the limits of the width and amplitude of the freedom guaranteed by Article 301 a rational and workable test to apply would be: Does the impugned restriction operate directly or immediately on trade or its movement?”

In the *Automobile Transport (Rajasthan) Ltd. v. The State of Rajasthan*², the view of Gajendragadkar, J., was accepted as corrected by the majority of the Judges. The principle was reiterated by this Court in *Andhra Sugars Ltd. v. State of Andhra Pradesh*³. In that case the question which arose was whether section 21 of the Andhra Pradesh Sugar Cane (Regulation of Supply and Purchase) Act which authorised the State Government to levy a tax at such rate not exceeding five rupees per metric tonne as may be prescribed on the purchase of cane required for use, consumption or sale in a factory was whether section 21 of the Andhra Pradesh Sugar Cane Regulation of Supply on the sale of goods did not directly impede or hamper the flow of trade and section 21 was no exception and was not violative of Article 301 of the Constitution. A similar view was expressed in the *State of Madras v. K. Nataraja Mudaliar*¹ in which the question at issue was whether sections 8 (2) and 8 (5) of the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956 were intra vires of Articles 301 and 303 of the Constitution. It was pointed out that an Act which was merely enacted for the purpose of imposing tax which was to be collected and to be retained by the State did not amount to a law giving or authorising the giving of, any preference to one State over another, or making, or authorising the making of, any discrimination between one State and another merely because of varying rates of tax prevailing in different States. At page 156 of the report Shah, J., speaking for the Court observed :

“The flow of trade does not necessarily depend upon the rates of sales tax : it depends upon a variety of factors, such as the source of supply, place of consumption, existence of trade channels, the rates of freight, trading facilities, availability of efficient transport and other facilities for carrying on trade. Instances can easily be imagined of cases in which notwithstanding the lower rate of tax in a particular part of the country goods may be purchased from another part, where a higher rate of tax prevails. Supposing in a particular State in respect of a commodity the rate of tax is 2 per cent., but if the benefit of that low rate is offset by the freight which a merchant in another State may have to pay for carrying that commodity over a long distance, the merchant would be willing to purchase the goods from a nearer State even though the rate of tax in that State may be higher. Existence of long-standing business relations, availability of communications, credit facilities and a host of other factors—natural and business—enter into the maintenance of trade relations and the free flow of trade cannot necessarily be deemed to have been obstructed merely because in a particular State the rate of tax on sales is higher than the rates prevailing in other States”.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the High Court was not right in holding that the ratio of *Kalyani Stores case*² applied to the present case and that Kerala Act IX of 1964 was violative of Article 301 of the Constitution. The view taken by the High Court was that in the absence of any production of tobacco inside Kerala State, it was not competent for the Kerala Legislature to enact the impugned Act under Article 304(a) of the Constitution. In support of this view the High Court relied upon the following passage from the judgment of this Court :

“Exercise of the power under Article 304(a) can only be effective if the tax or duty imposed on goods imported from other States and the tax or duty imposed on similar goods manufactured or produced in that State are such that there is no discrimination against imported goods. As no foreign liquor is produced or manufactured in the State of Orissa, the power to legislate given by Article 304 is not available and the restriction which is declared on the ground of trade, commerce or intercourse by Article 301 of the Constitution remains unfettered.”

In our opinion the High Court has not correctly appreciated the import of the decision of this Court in the *Kalyani Stores case*². The appellant in that case challenged the imposition of a duty of excise on ‘foreign liquor’ imported into the Orissa State which had been levied at Rs. 40 per L. P. Gallon until

31st March, 1961 by virtue of a notification issued in 1937 under section 27 of the Bihar and Orissa Excise Act, 1915 and which had been enhanced with effect from 1st April, 1961 by a fresh notification. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that since no 'foreign liquor' was manufactured within the State and consequently no excise duty was being levied on any locally manufactured 'foreign liquor' countervailing duty could not be charged on such liquor brought from outside the State and that the impost was in violation of Articles 301, 303 and 304 of the Constitution. It was held by the majority of Judges that the notification dated 31st March, 1961 enhancing the levy by Rs. 30 per L. P. Gallon infringed the guarantee of freedom under Article 301 and may be saved only if it falls within the exception contained in Article 304. As no liquor was produced or manufactured within the State, the protection of Article 304 was not available. The decision was based on the assumption that the notification dated 31st March, 1961 enhancing duty on Foreign liquor infringed the guarantee under Article 301 and may be saved if it fell within the exceptions contained in Article 304 of the Constitution. The Court did not intend to lay down the proposition that the imposition of a duty or tax in every case would be tantamount per se to an infringement of Article 301. As we have already pointed out it is well established by numerous authorities of this Court that only such restrictions or impediments which directly or immediately impede the free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse fall within the prohibition imposed by Article 301. A tax may in certain cases directly and immediately restrict or hamper the flow of trade, but every imposition of tax does not do so. Every case must be judged on its own facts and in its own setting of time and circumstance. In the present case the High Court has not gone into the question whether the provisions of Act IX of 1964 and the notification dated 25th January, 1951 issued under the Cochin Tobacco Act constitute such restrictions or impediments as directly and immediately hamper free flow of trade, commerce and intercourse and, therefore, fall within the prohibition imposed under Article 301 of the Constitution. Unless the High Court first comes to the finding on the available material whether or not there is infringement of the guarantee under Article 301 of the Constitution the further question as to whether the statute is saved under Article 304 (b) does not arise and the principle laid down by this Court in *Kalyani Stores case*¹ cannot be invoked.

It was also said on behalf of the respondents that the State Legislature had no power to levy and collect licence fee under the impugned Act as it was in substance a duty of excise falling under the Union List. The contrary viewpoint was presented on behalf of the appellant and it was contended that the legislation falls under Entry 62 of List II and the State Legislature was competent to enact. It is open to the parties to argue this matter before the High Court at the time of re-hearing.

For the reasons already expressed we hold that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the Kerala High Court dated 3rd October, 1966 in O.P. No. 934 of 1964 should be set aside and the case should go back for hearing in the light of the law laid down in this judgment.

It is desirable that the High Court should give an opportunity to the parties to file further affidavits before taking up the case for re-hearing.

On behalf of the appellants Mr. Chagla has given an undertaking that the provisions of the Act would not be enforced against the respondents for a month from this date. The respondents say that they will apply to the Kerala High Court for stay in the meanwhile.

v.

... Respondents.Civil Procedure Code (V of 1908), Order 2, rule 2—Bar under—When attracted.

The requirement of Order 2, rule 2 is that every suit should include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of a cause of action. Cause of action is a cause of action which gives occasion for and forms the foundation of the suit. If that cause of action enables a person to ask for a larger and wider relief than that to which he limits his claim, he cannot afterwards seek to recover the balance in independent proceedings.

In the instant case, the cause of action on the basis of which the previous suit was brought does not form the foundation of the present suit. The cause of action mentioned in the earlier suit, assuming the same afforded a basis for a valid claim, did not enable the plaintiff to ask for any relief other than those he prayed for in that suit. In that suit he could not have claimed the relief which he seeks in this suit. Hence the trial Court and the High Court were not right in holding that the plaintiff's suit is barred by Order 2, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code.

Quære : Order 2, rule 2 whether applicable to a suit under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act.

— Answered by Special Leave from the Judgment and Decree, dated the 18th October, 1968 of the Mysore High Court in Regular First Appeal No. 56 of 1963.

M. C. Chagla, Senior Advocate, (R. Gopalakrishnan, Advocate, with him), for Appellant.

S. V. Gupte, Senior Advocate, (R. V. Pillai, Sadashiv Rao and P. Keshava Pillai, Advocates, with him), for Respondent No. 1.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—This is a plaintiff's appeal by Special Leave. The plaintiff sued for possession of the suit properties on the basis his title. The suit properties originally belonged to the family of one Veerbaswanth Rao Deshmukh. He died in 1892 without male issues, leaving behind him his widow Ratnabai and a daughter by name Lakshmibai. Ratnabai succeeded to the estate of her husband. She died in 1924. On her death Lakshmibai became entitled to the suit properties. But one Parwatibai alias Pravag Bai took unlawful possession of the suit properties. Hence Lakshmibai instituted a suit for their possession in the Court of Sadar Adalath, Gulbarga against the said Parwatibai and obtained a decree. In execution of the said decree Lakshmibai obtained delivery of the lands described in Schedule II to the plaint. Lakshmi died in 1948. Sometime thereafter Parwatibai also died. The defendant claiming to be the sister's son of Veerbaswanth Rao Deshmukh got himself impleaded as the legal representative of Lakshmibai in the execution proceedings and sought delivery of the lands mentioned in Schedule I of the plaint. Meanwhile one Vishwanath alleging to be the legal representative of Parwatibai got himself impleaded in the execution proceedings. Thereafter the defendant and Vishwanath entered into a compromise in pursuance of which Vishwanath delivered possession of the lands included in Schedule I to the defendant. Sometime thereafter the plaintiff applied to the Court to reopen the execution proceedings and implead him as the legal representative of Lakshmibai claiming that he is the adopted son of Lakshmibai. The executing Court dismissed his application holding that his remedy was by way of a separate suit. A revision taken against that order to the High Court was rejected. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a suit in the Court of Subordinate District Judge. Bidar for a declaration that he is entitled to be impleaded in the execution proceedings mentioned earlier as the representative of Lakshmibai and to proceed with the execution after setting aside the order made by the executing Court on the basis of the compromise entered into between the defendant and Vishwanath. It may be noted that that was the only relief asked for in the plaint. The purported cause of action for the suit was the dismissal of the plaintiffs application for impleading him in the execution proceedings. That suit should have been dismissed on the ground that it was not maintainable in law. But strangely enough it was dismissed on the ground that it was hit by section 42 of the Specific Relief Act inasmuch as the plaintiff did not sue for possession of the concerned property. Thereafter the suit from which this appeal arises was instituted by the plaintiff on the basis of his title. The trial Court dismissed his suit in respect of the lands mentioned in Schedule I of the plaint on the ground that the relief in question is barred by Order 2, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure. It decreed the suit for the possession of the lands mentioned in Schedule II except items 3 and 9. It also decreed the plaintiff's claim in respect of the cash amount mentioned in the plaint.

Both the plaintiff and the defendant went up in appeal to the High Court of Mysore as against the decision of the trial Court to the extent that decision was against them. The High Court affirmed the decision of the trial Court.

Before the trial Court and the High Court, there was controversy as regards the truth of adoption pleaded by the plaintiff. Both the Courts have upheld the plaintiff's claim that he was adopted by the husband of Lakshmibai. That question was not reopened before us.

Before the High Court, the learned Counsel for the plaintiff conceded that the plaintiff's suit in respect of items 3 and 9 of Schedule II of the plaint is barred by limitation. Hence that question stands concluded.

The only question that remains for consideration is whether the High Court and the trial Court were right in their conclusions that the plaintiff's claim in respect of the lands mentioned in Schedule I of the plaint is barred by Order 2, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure.

We are of the opinion that the trial Court and the High Court erred in holding that the plaintiff's suit in respect of the lands mentioned in plaint Schedule I is barred by Order 2, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure. The suit instituted by the plaintiff in the Court of Subordinate District Judge. Bidar for a declaration that he is entitled to be impleaded in the execution proceedings as legal representative of Lakshmibai and to proceed with the execution proceedings, was as mentioned earlier, a misconceived one. It was exercise in futility. His remedy was to file a suit for the possession of the concerned properties on the basis of his title.

The High Court and the trial Court proceeded on the erroneous basis that the former suit was a suit for a declaration of the plaintiff's title to the lands mentioned in Schedule I of the plaint. The requirement of Order 2, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure is that every suit should include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of a cause of action. "Cause of action" means the 'cause of action for which the suit was brought'. It cannot be said that the cause of action on which the present suit was brought is the same as that in the previous suit. Cause of action is a cause of action which gives occasion for and forms the foundation of the suit. If that cause of action enables a person to ask for a larger and wider relief than that to which he limits his claim, he cannot afterwards seek to recover the balance by independent proceedings—see *Mohd. Hafiz v. Mohd. Zakaria*¹.

As seen earlier the cause of action on the basis of which the previous suit was brought does not form the foundation of the present suit. The cause of action mentioned in the earlier suit, assuming the same afforded a basis for a valid claim, did not enable the plaintiff to ask for any relief other than those he prayed for in that suit. In that suit he could not have claimed the relief which he seeks in this suit. Hence the trial Court and the High Court were not right in holding that the plaintiff's suit is barred by Order 2, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure.

In view of our above conclusion, we have not thought it necessary to go into the controversy whether Order 2, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to a suit under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act.

We are unable to accept the contention of the learned Counsel for the appellant that we should allow to the appellant mesne profits at least from the date of the suit. No claim for mesne profits was made in the plaint. Therefore we cannot go into that question in this appeal. For the mesne profits, if any, due to the plaintiff, he must take separate steps according to law.

In the result this appeal is allowed and the trial Court's decree is modified by including therein the lands mentioned in Schedule I of the plaint. In other respects the decree of the trial Court is sustained. The appellant will be entitled to his costs both in this Court as well as in the High Court.

Constitution of India (1950), Article 32—Scope—The Sales Tax Officer forfeiting the amount (from the petitioner) realised from their customers outside Bombay on account of sales tax—Petitioner questioning the vires of the provision as violative of Article 19(1) (f) under Article 226 of the Constitution—Payment under coercion after failing in the High Court—Supreme Court striking down the provision as violative of Article 19(1) (f)—Petitioner filing the petition under Article 32 within six months from the date of judgment—Laches on the part of the petitioner if deprives him of the relief under Article 32.

Bombay Sales Tax Act (Bombay Act III of 1953), S. 12-A (4), Limitation Act (XXXVI of 1963.)

The Sales Tax Officer, by his order dated 17th March, 1958, forfeited a sum of Rs. 26,563.50 under section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act (Bombay Act III of 1953), which provision is similar to section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946. The petitioner promptly filed a writ petition in Bombay High Court challenging this order. His petition was dismissed on 28th November, 1958. He also failed in appeal before the Division Bench on 7th July, 1959. An order of attachment followed. The petitioner paid the sum of Rupees 26,563.50 in various instalments from 3rd October, 1959 to 8th August, 1960.

On 29th September, 1967, on appeal from the decision of the Gujarat High Court in Kantilal Bahulal v. H. G. Patel Sales Tax Officer (1965) 16 S.T.C. 973. Section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946 was struck down in Kantilal Bahulal v. H. C. Patel, Sales Tax Officer, (1968) 21 S.T.C. 174: (1968) 1 S.C.J. 768, as it infringed Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. On 9th February, 1968, the petitioner filed a writ petition under Article 32 of the Constitution praying that the order dated 17th March, 1958 and the notice and the order, dated 18th December, 1958 and 24th December, 1958, be quashed.

Could any time-limit be imposed on petitions under Article 32 of the Constitution?

Could the Indian Limitation Act be applied by analogy appropriate to the facts of the case?

What is to be done in this case?

Held by majority (Hidayatullah, C. J. and Bachawat and Mitter, JJ.) with Sikri and Hedge, JJ. dissenting.

Per Hidayatullah, C. J.—A petition under Article 32 is not a suit and it is also not petition or an application to which the Limitation Act applies. To put curbs in the way enforcement of Fundamental Rights through legislative action might well be questioned under Article 13 (2). If a short period of limitation were prescribed the Fundamental Right might well be frustrated. Prescribing too long period might enable stale claims to be made to the detriment of other rights which might emerge. If then there is no period prescribed what is the standard to follow? Utmost expedition is the sine qua non for such claims. The party aggrieved must move the Court at the earliest possible time and explain satisfactorily all semblance of delay. Where there is appearance of avoidable delay and this delay affects the merits of the claim, this Court will consider it and in a proper case hold the party disentitled to invoke the extraordinary jurisdiction. Therefore, the question is one of discretion for this Court to follow from case to case. It will depend on what the breach of the Fundamental Right and the remedy claimed are and how the delay arose.

The question is: Can the petitioner in this case take advantage, after a lapse of a number of years, of the decision of this Court? Everybody is presumed to know the law. It was his duty to have brought the matter before this Court for consideration. In any event, having set the machinery of law in motion he cannot abandon it to resume it after a number of years, because another person more adventurous than he in his turn got the statute declared unconstitutional, and got a favourable decision. There is no question here of a mistake of law entitling the petitioner to invoke analogy of the Article in the Limitation Act. The present petitioner should have taken the right ground in the High Court and taken it in appeal to this Court after the High Court decided against it. Not having done so and having abandoned his own litigation years ago, this Court cannot apply the analogy of the Article in the Limitation Act and give him the relief now.

Per Sikri, J.—The petitioner was under a mistake of law, when he paid up, the mistake being that he thought section 12-A (4) was a valid provision in spite of its imposing unreasonable restrictions. This mistake he discovered like all assesses when this Court struck down section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales-tax Act. He has come to this Court within six months of that day and there is no delay.

Per Bachawat, J.—The normal remedy for recovery of money paid to the State under coercion or mistake of law is by suit. Where the remedy in a writ application under Article 32 or Article 226 corresponds to a remedy in an ordinary suit and the latter remedy subject to the bar of a statute of limitation, the Court in its writ jurisdiction acts by analogy to the statute, adopts the statute as its own rule of procedure and in the absence of special circumstances imposes the same limitation on the summary remedy in the writ jurisdiction. If the right to property is extinguished by prescription under section 27 of the Limitation Act, 1963, the petitioner has no subsisting right which can be enforced under Article 32.

Per Mitter, J.—A payment under coercion has to be treated in the same way for the purpose of a claim to refund as a payment under mistake of law, but there is an important distinction between the two. A payment under a mistake of law may be questioned only when the mistake is discovered but a person who is under no misapprehension as to his legal rights and complains about the illegality or the ultra vires nature of the order passed against him can immediately after payment formulate his cause of action as one of payment under coercion. As the petitioners have come to this Court long after the date when they could have properly filed a suit, the application must be rejected.

Per Hedge, J.—The right given to the citizens to move this Court under Article 32 is itself a fundamental right and the same cannot be circumscribed or curtailed except as provided by the Constitution. It is inappropriate to equate the duty imposed on this Court to the powers of Chancery Court in England or the equitable jurisdiction of the American Courts. A duty imposed by the Constitution cannot be compared with discretionary powers. The power conferred on this Court by Article 32 is not a discretionary power. This power is not similar to the power conferred on the High Courts under Article 226 of the Constitution. Hence laches on the part of an aggrieved party cannot deprive him of the right to get relief from this Court under Article 32.

The Judgments of the Court were delivered by Hidayatullah, C. J.—This petition has led to a sharp division of opinion of among my brethren: Sikri and Hedge, JJ., would allow the petition and Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., would dismiss it. They have differed on the question whether the petition deserves to be dismissed on the ground of delay. I agree in the result reached by Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., and would also dismiss it. I wish to state briefly my reasons.

At the threshold it appears to me that as there is no law which prescribes a period of limitation for such petitions, each of my brethren has really given expression to the practice he follows or intends to follow. I can do no more than state the views I hold on this subject and then give my decision on the merits of the petition in the light of those views.

The problem divides itself into two. The first part is a general question to be considered in two aspects: (a) whether any limit of time at all can be imposed on petitions under Article 32, and (b) whether this Court would apply by analogy an article of the Indian Limitation Act appropriate to the facts of the case or any other limit? The second is what is to be done in this case? I shall begin by stating my views on the first question.

There appears to be some confusion about the scope of Article 32. That Article gives the right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for enforcement of the rights conferred by Part III of the Constitution. The provision merely keeps open the doors of this Court, in much the same way, as it used to be said, the doors of the Chancery Court were always open. The State cannot place any hindrance in the way of an aggrieved person seeking to approach this Court. This is logical enough for it is against State action that Fundamental Rights are claimed. But the guarantee goes no further at least on the terms of Article 32. Having reached this Court, the extent or manner of interference is for the Court to decide. It is clear that every case does not merit interference. That must always depend upon the facts of the case. In dealing with cases which have come before it, this Court has already settled many principles on which it acts. A few of them may be mentioned here.

This Court does not take action in cases covered by the ordinary jurisdiction of the civil Courts, that is to say, it does not convert civil and criminal actions into proceedings for the obtainment of writs. Although there is no rule or provision of law to prohibit the exercise of its extraordinary jurisdiction this Court has always insisted upon recourse to ordinary remedies or the exhaustion of other remedies. It is in rare cases, where the ordinary process of law appears to be inefficacious, that this Court interferes even where other remedies are available. This attitude arises from the acceptance of a salutary principle that extraordinary remedies should not take the place of ordinary remedies.

Then again this Court refrains from acting under Article 32 if the party has already moved the High Court under Article 226. This constitutes a comity between the Supreme Court and the High Court. Similarly, when a party had already moved the High Court with a similar complaint and for the same relief and failed, this Court insists on an appeal to be brought before it and does not allow fresh proceedings to be started. In this connection the principle of res judicata has been applied, although the expression is somewhat inapt and unfortunate. The reason of the rule no doubt is public policy which Coke summarised as "interest reipublicae res judicatas non rescindi" but the motivating factor is the existence of another parallel jurisdiction in another Court and that Court having been moved, this Court insists on bringing its decision before this Court for review. Again this Court distinguishes between cases in which a speaking order on merits has been passed. Where the order is not speaking or the matter has been disposed of on some other ground at the threshold, this Court in a suitable case entertains the application before itself. Another restraint which this Court puts on itself is that it does not allow a new ground to be taken in appeal. In the same way, this Court has refrained from taking action when a better remedy is to move the High Court under Article 226 which can go into the controversy more comprehensively than this Court can under Article 32.

It follows, therefore, that this Court puts itself in restraint in the matter of petitions under Article 32 and this practice has now become inveterate. The question is whether this Court will inquire into belated and state claims or take note of evidence of neglect of one's own rights for a long time? I am of opinion that not only it would but also that it should. The party claiming Fundamental Rights must move the Court before other rights come into existence. The action of Courts cannot harm innocent parties if their rights emerge by reason of delay on the part of the person moving the Court. This principle is well-recognised and has been applied by Courts in England and America.

The English and American practice has been outlined in Halsbury's Laws of England and corpus juris secum.um. It has been mentioned by my brethren in their opinions and I need not traverse the same grounds again except to say this that Courts of Common Law in England were bound by the Law of Limitation but not the Courts of Chancery. Even so the Chancery Courts insisted on expedition. It is trite learning to refer to the maxim "delay defeats equity" or the latin of it that the Courts help those who are vigilant and do not alumber over their rights. The Courts of Chancery, therefore, frequently applied to suits in equity the analogy of the law of Limitation applicable to actions at law and equally frequently put a special limitation of their own if they thought that the suit was unduly delayed. This was independently of the analogy of law relating to limitation. The same practice has been followed in the United States.

In India we have the Limitation Act which prescribes different periods of limitation for suits, petitions or applications. There are also residuary Articles which prescribe limitation in those cases where no express period is provided. If it were a matter of a suit or application, either an appropriate article or the residuary article would have applied. But a petition under Article 32 is not a suit and it is also not a petition or an application to which the Limitation Act applies. To put curbs in the way of enforcement of Fundamental Rights through legislative action might well be questioned under Article 13 (2). The reason is also quite clear. If a short period of limitation were prescribed the Fundamental Right might well be frustrated. Prescribing too long a period might enable stale claims to be made to the detriment of other rights which might emerge.

If then there is no period prescribed what is the standard for this Court to follow? I should say that utmost expedition is the sine qua non for such claims. The party aggrieved must move the Court at the earliest possible time and explain satisfactory all semblance of delay. I am not indicating any period which may be regarded as the ultimate limit of action for that would be taking upon myself legislative functions. In England a period of 6 months has been provided statutorily, but that could be because there is no guaranteed remedy and the matter is one entirely of discretion. In India I will only say that each case will have to be considered on its own facts. Where there is appearance of avoidable delay and this delay affects the merits of the claim, this Court will consider it and in a proper case hold the party disentitled to invoke the extraordinary jurisdiction.

Therefore, the question is one of discretion for this Court to follow from case to case. There is no lower limit and there is no upper limit. A case may be brought within Limitation Act by reason of some Article but this Court need not necessarily give the total time to the litigant to move this Court under Article 32. Similarly in a suitable case this Court may entertain such a petition even after a lapse of time. It will all depend on what the breach of the Fundamental Right and the remedy claimed are and how the delay arose.

Applying these principles to the present case what do I find? The petitioner moved the High Court for relief on the ground that the recovery from him was unconstitutional. He set out a number of grounds but did not set out the ground on which ultimately in another case recovery was struck down by this Court. That ground was that the provisions of the Act were unconstitutional. The question is: can the petitioner in this case take advantage, after a lapse of a number of years, of the decision of this Court? He moved the High Court but did not come up in appeal to this Court. His contention is that the ground on which his petition was dismissed was different and the ground on which the statute was struck down was not within his knowledge and therefore he did not know of it and pursue it in this Court. To that I answer that law will presume that he knew the exact ground of unconstitutionality. Everybody is presumed to know the law. It was his duty to have brought the matter before this Court for consideration. In any event, having set the machinery of law in motion he cannot abandon it to resume it after a number of years, because another person more adventurous than he in his turn got the statute declared unconstitutional, and got a favourable decision. If I were to hold otherwise, then the decision of the High Court in any case once adjudicated upon and acquiesced in may be questioned in a fresh litigation revived only with the argument that the correct position was not known to the petitioner at the time when he abandoned his own litigation. I agree with the opinion of my brethren Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., that there is no question here of a mistake of law entitling the petitioner to invoke analogy of the Article in the Limitation Act. The grounds on which he moved the Court might well have impressed this Court which might have also have decided the question of the unconstitutionality of the Act as was done in the subsequent litigation by another party. The present petitioner should have taken the right ground in the High Court and taken it in appeal to this Court after the High Court decided against it. Not having done so and having abandoned his own litigation years ago, I do not think that this Court should apply the analogy of the Article in the Limitation Act and give him the relief now. The petition, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Sikri, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the drafts of the judgments prepared by Mitter, J., and Bachawat, J. I agree with Mitter, J., in his conclusion that the rule laid down in *Daryao v. State of U.P.*¹ is inapplicable to the facts of the case, but for the reasons I will presently give, in my opinion the petition should be allowed.

Article 32 (2) of the Constitution confers a judicial power on the Court. Like all judicial powers, unless there is an express provision to the contrary, it must be exercised in accordance with fundamental principles of administration of justice. General principles of res judicata were accordingly applied by this Court in *Daryao v. State of U.P.*¹ and *Amalgamated Coalfields Ltd. v. Janapada Subha, Chinawara*². I understand that one of the fundamental principles of administration of justice is that, apart from express provisions to the contrary, stale claims should not be given effect to. But what is a stale claim? It is not denied that the Indian Limitation Act does not directly apply to a petition under article 32. Both the English Courts and the American Courts were confronted with a similar problem. In the United States the Federal Courts of Equity solved the problem thus:

“Except, perhaps, where the statute by its express terms applies to suits in equity as well as to actions at law, or where the jurisdiction of law and equity is concurrent, the rule appears to be that Federal Courts sitting in equity are not bound by state statutes of limitation. Nevertheless, except where unusual conditions or extraordinary circumstances render it equitable to do so, the Federal Courts usually act in analogy to the state statutes of limitation applicable to cases of like character.” (Vol. 34, American Jurisprudence, Limitation of Actions, 154).”

In Courts of Admiralty, where the statutes of limitation do not control proceedings, the analogy of such statutes is ordinarily followed unless there is something exceptional in the case. (ibid)

Story on Equity Jurisprudence states the legal position thus:

“It was too, a most material ground, in all bills for an account, to ascertain whether they were brought to open and correct errors in the account recenti facto; or whether the application was made after a great lapse of time. In cases of this sort, where the demand was strictly of a legal nature, or might be cognizable at law, Courts of equity governed themselves by the same limitations as to entertain such suits as were prescribed by the Statute of Limitations in regard to suits in Courts of common law in matters of account. If, therefore, the ordinary limitation of such suits at law was six years, Courts of equity would follow the same period of limitation. In so doing, they did not Act, in cases of this sort (that is, in matter of concurrent jurisdiction) so much upon the ground of analogy to the Statute of Limitations, as positively in obedience to such statute. But where the demand was not of a legal nature, but was purely equitable; or where the bar of the statute was inapplicable; Courts of equity had another rule, founded sometimes upon the analogies of the law, where such analogy existed, and sometimes upon its own inherent doctrine, not to entertain stale or antiquated demands, and not to encourage laches and negligence. Hence, in matters of account, although not barred by the Statute of Limitations, Courts of equity refused to interfere after a considerable lapse of time, from considerations of public policy, from the difficulty of doing entire justice, when the original transactions had become obscure by time, and the evidence might have been lost, and from the consciousness that the repose of titles and the security of property are mainly promoted by a full enforcement of the maxim, Vigilanti bus, non dormientibus jura subveniunt. Under peculiar circumstances, however, excusing or justifying the delay, Courts of equity would not refuse their aid in furtherance of the rights of the party; since in such cases there was no pretence to insist upon laches or negligence, as a ground for dismissal of the suit; and in one case carried back the account over a period of fifty years." (Third Edition, page 224, 529).

In England, as pointed out by Bachawat, J., the Court of Chancery acted on the analogy of Statute of Limitation (vide Halsbury, Vol. 14 p. 647, article 1190).

It seems to me, however, that the above solution is not quite appropriate for petitions under article 32. A delay of 12 years or 6 years would make a strange bed-fellow with a direction or order or writ in the nature of mandamus, certiorari and prohibition. Bearing in mind the history of these writs I cannot believe that the Constituent Assembly had the intention that five Judges of this Court should sit together to enforce a fundamental right at the instance of a person, who had without any reasonable explanation slept over his rights for 6 or 12 years. The history of these writs both in England and the U.S.A., convinces me that the underlying idea of the Constitution was to provide an expeditious and authoritative remedy against the inroads of the State. If a claim is barred under the Limitation Act, unless there are exceptional circumstances, prima facie it is a stale claim and should not be entertained by this Court. But even if it is not barred under the Indian Limitation Act, it may not be entertained by this Court if on the facts of the case there is unreasonable delay. For instance, if the State had taken possession of property under a law alleged to be void, and if a petitioner comes to this Court 11 years after the possession was taken by the State, I would dismiss the petition on the ground of delay, unless there is some reasonable explanation. The fact that a suit for possession of land would still be in time would not be relevant at all. It is difficult to lay down a precise period beyond which delay should be explained. I favour one year because this Court should not be approached lightly, and competent legal advice should be taken and pros and cons carefully weighed before coming to this Court. It is common knowledge that appeals and representations to the higher authorities take time; time spent in pursuing these remedies may not be excluded under the Limitation Act, but it may ordinarily be taken as a good explanation for the delay.

It is said that if this was the practice the guarantee of article 32 would be destroyed. But the article nowhere says that a petition, howsoever late, should be entertained and a writ or order or direction granted, howsoever remote the date of infringement of the fundamental right. In practice this Court has not been entertaining stale claims by persons who have slept over their rights. There is no need to depart from this practice and tie our hands completely with the shackles imposed by the Indian Limitation Act. In the case of applications under article 226 this Court observed in State of Madhya Pradesh v Bhailal Bhai.¹

"It may however be stated as a general rule that if there has been unreasonable delay the Court ought not ordinarily to lend its aid to a party by this extraordinary remedy of mandamus. Again, where even if there is no such delay the Government or the statutory authority against whom the consequential relief is prayed for raises a prima facie triable issue as regards the availability of such relief on the merits on grounds like limitation, the Court should ordinarily refuse to issue the writ of mandamus for such payment. In both these kinds of cases it will be sound use of discretion to leave the party to seek his remedy by the ordinary mode of action in a civil Court and to refuse to exercise in his favour the extraordinary remedy under article 226 of the Constitution."

In *State of Kerala v. Aluminium Industries*² Wanchoo, J., speaking on behalf of a large Bench of this Court, observed:

"There is no doubt in view of the decision of this Court in *Sales Tax Officer v. Kanhaiyalal*³ that money paid under a mistake of law comes within the word "mistake" in section 72 of the Contract Act and there is no question of estoppel when the mistake of law is common to both the parties, which was the case here inasmuch as the respondent did not raise the question relating to Article 286 of the Constitution and the Sales Tax Officer had no occasion to consider it. In such a case where tax is levied by mistake of law it is ordinarily the duty of the State subject to any provision in the law relating to sales tax (and no such provision has been brought to our notice) to refund the tax. If refund is not made, remedy through Court is open subject to the same restrictions and also to the period of limitation (see Article 96 of the Limitation Act, 1908), namely, three years from the date when the mistake becomes known to the person who has made the payment by mistake (see *State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai*¹). In this view of the matter it was the duty of the State to investigate the facts when the mistake was brought to its notice and to make a refund if mistake was proved and the claim was made within the period of limitation."

But these cases cannot directly apply to petitions under article 32 because they proceed from the premise that the remedy is discretionary under article 226.

Coming to the facts of this case, which have been stated in detail by Mitter, J., it seems to me that the delay in coming to this Court has been adequately explained. In brief, the facts are these: The Sales Tax Officer, by his order dated 17th March, 1958, forfeited a sum of Rs. 26,563.50 under section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act (Bombay Act III of 1953), which provision is similar to section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946. The petitioner promptly filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court challenging this order. His petition was dismissed on 28th November, 1958. He also failed in appeal before the Division Bench on 7th July, 1959. An order of attachment followed. The petitioner paid the sum of Rs. 26,563.50 in various instalments from 3rd October, 1959, to 8th August, 1960. By letter dated 9th January, 1962, the petitioner was called upon to pay a penalty amounting to Rs. 12,517.68 on account of late payment of Sales Tax dues but this order of penalty was ultimately cancelled.

The Gujarat High Court (Shelat, C.J., and Bhagwati, J.) in *Kantilal Babulal v. H. C. Patel, Sales Tax Officer*¹ held on 2nd December, 1963, that section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946 was valid and did not violate Article 19 (i) (f) as it was saved by article 19 (5). On 29th September, 1967, this Court, on appeal, in *Kantilal Babulal v. H. C. Patel, Sales Tax Officer*² struck down this provision as it infringed Article 19 (1) (f). On 9th February, 1968, four petitioners—hereinafter compendiously referred to as the petitioner—filed this petition praying that the order dated 17th March, 1958, and the notice and order dated 18th December, 1958, and 24th December, 1958, be quashed.

There is no doubt that under section 72 of the Contract Act the petitioner would be entitled to the relief claimed and the refund of the amount if he paid the money under mistake of law. I find it difficult to appreciate why the payment was not made under a mistake of law. In my opinion the petitioner was mistaken in thinking that the money was liable to be refunded under a valid law. No body has urged before us that the grounds which he had raised before the High Court were sound.

The petitioner had attempted to raise before the Bombay High Court the following grounds:

“1. Inasmuch as the sum of Rs. 26,563.50 was paid by way of refund under the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946, the taxing authorities had exceeded their power under section 21 (4) of the Act of 1953, in forfeiting the said sum of money.

2. Assuming that the respondent had power to forfeit the sum under the Act of 1953, it was strictly limited to taxes payable under the provisions of the Act and as no tax was payable on outside sales the authorities had no power to forfeit the sum of Rs. 26,563.50

3. * * * * *

4. Even assuming while denying that the respondent had power to forfeit the sum of Rs. 26,563.50, the power to forfeit an amount as a tax presupposes a power to impose a tax and inasmuch as on a proper construction of the relevant provisions of the Constitution no State Legislature had at any time a power to impose tax on the aforesaid transactions, the power to forfeit tax in respect of those transactions is ultra vires the State Legislature.”

The learned Single Judge held:

“This appears to me to be a gross case where even if I was of the opinion that the order is invalid and involved violation of fundamental rights I would not in my discretion interfere by way of issuing a writ. I am not depriving the petitioner of any other appropriate remedy. I have, therefore, decided to dismiss this petition on that single ground.”

The Division Bench, on appeal, decided on the limited ground that “Mr. Justice K. K. Desai having exercised his discretion no case is made out for interference with the exercise of that discretion." The petitioner rightly did not file an appeal to this Court for he would have had little chance of succeeding.

1. (1965) 16 S.T.C. 973.

2. (1968) 21 S.T.C. 174 : (1968) 1 S.C.J. 763.

Suppose a petitioner challenges a provision of the Sales Tax Act before the High Court on the ground that it does not fall within List II or List III of the Seventh Schedule. He fails and pays the tax and does not appeal to the Supreme Court. Ultimately, in another petition, the provision is struck down under article 14 or article 19, a point which he and his lawyers never thought of. All assesseees who had paid tax without challenging the provision would be entitled to approach this Court under article 32 and claim a refund (see Sales Tax Officer, Benaras v. Kanhaiya Lal Mukundlal Saraf). But why not the assessee who applied to the High Court? The answer given is that he had thought at one time that the law was bad, though on wrong grounds. If a law were framed sanctioning the above discrimination, I believe, it would be difficult to sustain it under article 14, but yet this is the discrimination which the respondent wants me to sanction.

The grounds extracted above show that it never struck the petitioner that the provision could be challenged on the ground ultimately accepted by this Court. If the petitioner had not thought of going to the Bombay High Court on the points he did, and had paid on demand, as most of the assesseees do, he would, I imagine, have been entitled to maintain this petition. But it is now said that the petitioner's position is worse because he exercised his right to approach the High Court under Article 226. The contention seems to be that when a petitioner approaches a High Court and fails, he can no longer suffer from any mistake of law even if the point on which this Court ultimately strikes down the provision, never struck him or his lawyer or the Court. I cannot uphold this contention.

In my opinion the petitioner was under a mistake of law, when he paid up, the mistake being that he thought that section 12-A (4) was a valid provision in spite of its imposing unreasonable restrictions. This mistake he discovered like all assesseees when this Court struck down section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act. He has come to this Court within six months of that day and there is no delay.

The petition is accordingly allowed and the impugned order dated 17th March, 1958, quashed and the respondent directed to refund the amount. Under the circumstances there will be no order as to costs.

Bachawat, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment prepared by G. K. Mitter, J. For the reasons given in this judgment, I agree with the order proposed by him. As the earlier petition filed in the High Court was not dismissed on the merits, the present petition is not barred by res judicata or principle analogous thereto.

The petitioners realised Rs. 26,563.50 P from their customers outside Bombay on account of sales tax. The Sales Tax Officer by his order dated 17th March, 1958 forfeited this sum under section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act (III of 1953). On 28th March, 1958, the petitioners filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court seeking to restrain Sales Tax Officer from recovering the amount. They pleaded that they were not liable to pay the amount, that section 21 (4) was ultra vires the powers of the State Legislature and that the order of forfeiture was violative of Articles 19 (1) (f) and 365 of the Constitution and was invalid. On 28th November, K. K. Desai, J., dismissed the petition. He held that the petitioners having defrauded other persons were not entitled to any relief. The petitioners filed an appeal against the order. In the memorandum of appeal, they pleaded that the threatened levy was in violation of Articles 19 (1) (f) and 31 of the Constitution. The appeal was dismissed on 13th July, 1959. In the meantime on 24th December, 1958, the Collector of Bombay attached the petitioners' properties. Between 3rd August, 1959 and 8th August, 1960, the petitioners paid the sum of Rs. 26,563.50 P. to the Collector of Bombay. In *Kantilal Bapulal and Brothers v. H. C. Patel*¹ decided on 29th September, 1967, this Court struck down section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946, as unconstitutional and violative of Article 19 (1) (f). The arguments in the present appeal proceeded on the assumption that section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953 is liable to be struck down on the same ground. On 9th February, 1968, the petitioners filed the present writ petition under Article 32 of the Constitution claiming refund of Rs. 26,563.50P under section 72 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. They alleged that they paid this sum to the Collector under coercion and/or mistake of law, and that they discovered the mistake on 29th September, 1967.

The points arise for decision in this writ petition: (1) Would the claim be barred by limitation if it were the subject-matter of a suit in February, 1968 and (2) if so, are the petitioners entitled to any relief in this petition under Article 32 of the Constitution.

Subject to questions of limitation, waiver and estoppel, money paid under mistake or coercion may be recovered under section 72 of the Indian Contract Act. The right to relief under section 72 extends to money paid under mistake of law, i.e. "mistake in thinking that the money paid was due when, in fact, it was not due." *Shiva Prasad Singh v. Srish Chandra Nandi*², *Sales Tax Officer v. Mulchandlal Saraf*³.

In my opinion, the petitioners were not labouring under any mistake of law when they made the payments. As early as March, 1958, they filed a writ petition for restraining the levy under the order dated 17th March, 1958, claiming that the order was in valid and that section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953, was ultra vires and unconstitutional. They might not have then known the precise ground upon which the Court subsequently struck down a similar provision of law, but they had discovered presumably under legal advice that they were not legally bound to make any payment. After the writ petition was dismissed their properties were attached and they made the payments under coercion in 1959 and 1960. The payments were not made under a mistake of law or as pointed out in *Shiva Prasad Singh's case*² under a mistake in thinking that the money was due. They cannot claim any relief on the ground of mistake.

As we are assuming in favour of the petitioners that section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953 as invalid, we must hold that they made the payments under coercion. A suit for the recovery of the money on this ground instituted on 1st January, 1964, would be governed by Article 24 of the Limitation Act, 1963, and the period of limitation would be three years from the dates in 1959 and 1960 when the money was received by the respondents. The petitioners cannot obtain an extension of the period under section 30(a) of the Limitation Act, 1963, as Article 62 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, prescribed the same period of limitation. A suit for recovery of tax or other levy illegally collected was governed by Article 62 and not by Article 120, see *A. Venkata Subba Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh*⁴. Accordingly a suit for the recovery of money instituted in February, 1968, would be barred by limitation.

If the petitioners could claim relief on the ground of mistake the suit would be governed by Article 96 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and time would begin to run from the date when the mistake becomes known to the plaintiff. In *State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai and others*¹ and *State of Kerala v. Aluminium Industries Ltd.*² it was held that Art. 96 applied to a suit for recovery of money paid under a mistake of law. Section 17 (1) (c) of the Limitation Act, 1963, now provides that in the case of a suit for relief from the consequences of a mistake the period of limitation does not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the mistake or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it. Section 17 (1) (c) corresponds to section 26 (c) of the Limitation Act, 1939 (2 & 3 Geo. 6, c. 21). It was held in *Re Diplock*³ that section 26 (c) applied by analogy to a suit for recovery of money paid under mistake of law. On appeal, the House of Lords said that the section presented many problems and refrained from saying more about it, see Ministry of Health v. Simpson.⁴ In some American States, it has been held that a mistake of law cannot be regarded as a mistake within a similar statute and time ran from the date of the accrual of the cause of action, see Corpus Juris Secundum Vol. 54, Limitation of Actions, Article 198, page 202, Morgans v. Jasper County,⁵ and the cases referred to therein. It is not necessary to pursue the matter any further as the petitioners cannot claim relief on the ground of mistake. Accordingly, I express no opinion on the scope of section 17 (c) of the Limitation Act, 1963. For the reasons already stated a suit for the recovery of the money instituted in February, 1968, would be barred by limitation.

The next and the more fundamental question is whether in the circumstances the Court should give relief in a writ petition under Article 32 of the Constitution. No period of limitation is prescribed for such a petition. The right to move this Court for enforcement of fundamental rights is guaranteed by Article 32. The writ under Article 32 issues as a matter of course if a breach of a fundamental right is established. Technical rules applicable to suits like the provisions of section 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure are not applicable to a proceeding under Article 32. But this does not mean that in giving relief under Article 32, the Court must ignore and trample under foot all laws of procedure, evidence, limitation, res judicata and the like. Under Article 145 (1) (c) rules may be framed for regulating the practice and procedure in proceedings under Article 32. In the absence of such rules the Court may adopt any reasonable rule of procedure. Thus a petitioner has no right to move this Court under Article 32 for enforcement of his fundamental right on a petition containing misleading and inaccurate statements, and if he files such a petition the Court will dismiss it, see *Indiam Sugar and Refineries Ltd. v. Union of India*⁶ decided on 12th March, 1967. On grounds of public policy it would be intolerable if the Court were to entertain such a petition. Likewise the Court held in *Daryao v. The State of U. P.*⁷ that the general principles of res judicata applied to a writ petition under Article 32. Similarly, this Court has summarily dismissed innumerable writ petitions on the ground that it was presented after unreasonable delay.

The normal remedy for recovery of money paid to the State under coercion or mistake of law is by suit. Articles 32 and 226 of the Constitution provide concurrent remedy in respect of the same claim. The extraordinary remedies under the constitution are not intended to enable the claimant to recover monies, the recovery of which by suit is barred by limitation. Where the remedy in a writ application under Article 32 or Article 226 corresponds to a remedy in an ordinary suit and the latter remedy is subject to the bar of a statute of limitation, the Court in its writ jurisdiction acts by analogy to the statute, adopts the statute as its own rule of procedure and in the absence of special circumstances imposes the same limitation on the summary remedy in the writ jurisdiction. On similar grounds the Court of Chancery acted on the analogy of the statutes of limitation in disposing of stale claims though the proceeding in a Chancery was not subject to any express statutory bar, see Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 14, page 647. Article 1190, *Knox v. Gve.*¹ Likewise, the High Court acts on the analogy of the statute of limitation in a proceeding under Article 226 though the statute does not expressly apply to the proceeding. The Court will almost always refuse to give relief under Article 226 if the delay is more than the statutory period of limitation, see *State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai*² at pages 273-274.

1. (1964) 6 S.C.R. 261, 274.

2. (1965) 16 S.T.C. 689, 692.

3. (1948) 7 Ch. 465, 515-516.

Similarly this Court acts on the analogy of the statute of limitation in respect of a claim under Article 32 of the Constitution though such claim is not the subject of any express statutory bar of limitation. If the right to a property is extinguished by prescription under section 27 of the Limitation Act, 1963, the petitioner has no subsisting right which can be enforced under Article 32 (see *Sobhraj Odharma v. State of Rajasthan*³). In other cases where the remedy only and not the right is extinguished by limitation, it is on grounds of public policy that the Court refuses to entertain state claims under Article 32. The statutes of limitation are founded on sound principles of public policy. As observed in Whitley Stoke's Anglo-Indian Codes, Vol. 11, page 940: "The law is founded on public policy, its aim being to secure the quiet of the community, to suppress fraud and perjury, to quicken diligence, and to prevent oppression." In *Her Highness Rukmahar v. Tu'qabbah Mattickshund*⁴ the Privy Council observed that the object of the statutes of limitation was to give effect to the maxim, "interest Reipublice ut sit finis litium"⁵ (co lutt 303)—the interest of the State requires that there should be a limit to litigation. The rule of res judicata is founded upon the same rule of public policy, see *Daryao v. State of U.P.*⁶ at page 584. The other ground of public policy upon which the statutes of limitation are founded is expressed in the maxim "vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt" (2 Co. Inst. 690)—the laws aid the vigilant and not those who slumber. On grounds of public policy the Court applies the principles of res judicata to writ petitions under Article 32. On like grounds the Court acts on the analogy of the statutes of limitation in the exercise of its jurisdiction under Article 32. It follows that the present petition must be dismissed.

Mitter, J.—The facts leading up to the filing of the petition under Article 32 of the Constitution are as follows.

The first petitioner before us is a registered partnership firm (hereinafter referred to as 'the firm') carrying on business in Bombay and the other petitioners are partners of the said firm. The firm has been carrying on business as a dealer in and a trader of textiles and art silk, etc. It was registered as a dealer and has held registration certificates under the various sales tax laws prevailing in the State of Bombay from 1946 onwards including the Bombay Sales Tax Act (V of 1946), the Bombay Sales Tax Act (III of 1963) and the Bombay Sales Tax Act (LI of 1959).

4. (1851-52) 5 M.I.A. 234, 251.

5. (1962) 1 S.C.J. 702.

In the course of assessment for the assessment period commencing on 1st April, 1949, and ending on 31st October, 1952, the firm contended that its sales of the value of Rs. 13,42,165-15-6 were not liable to be taxed under the provisions of the Bombay Sales Tax Act then in force as the goods were delivered as a direct result of such sales for purposes of consumption outside the State of Bombay. The firm claimed that it was entitled to a refund of the amount which it had collected from its customers and paid on account of the aforesaid sales at the time of submitting the returns of its turnover. The Sales Tax Officer did not accept this contention but on appeal the Assistant Collector of Sales Tax upheld the firm's contention after examining the details submitted by it and found that the sales involving the sum of Rs. 26,563-8-0 realised by way of tax were protected under Art. 286 of the Constitution. He therefore directed that the said sum be refunded to the firm on a proper application. This appellate order was passed on 7th November, 1956. The firm preferred an application for refund of Rs. 26,563-50 on 13th November, 1956, whereupon the Assistant Collector (the appellate authority) simultaneously with the issue of a cheque for the above amount by way of refund wrote a letter dated 11th May, 1957, to the effect that the petitioner should produce before him within one month of the date of the cheque receipt totalling Rs. 26,563-50 from its customers outside Bombay State to show that the refund had been passed on to them. It appears that the petitioner did not fulfil this condition and a notice dated 28th January, 1958, was issued calling upon the firm to show cause why the said sum of Rs. 26,563-50 should not be forfeited under section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953. In reply thereto, the firm stated by letter dated 7th February, 1958, that it had collected from its customers outside the State of Bombay the said sum of money and "under an honest mistake of law had paid the same to the sales tax authorities". The firm went on to add that the order for refund had been made only when the authorities were satisfied that it was not liable to pay the said sum but the latter had insisted upon a condition that the firm should in its turn refund the said amount to its customers from whom the collection had been made. The letter records that the firm "had agreed to that condition under coercion even though in law the authorities were bound to refund the said amount without any such condition." Further the firm's case in that letter was that the authorities had "no right to forfeit any amount collected by a dealer under a mistake of law in respect of these transactions" and the threat to forfeit the amount on the ground that it had not been refunded to the firm's customers was without the authority of law.

The order on the show cause notice passed on 17th March, 1958, records that though given sufficient opportunity to produce stamped receipts from its customers the firm had failed to do so and had thereby contravened the provisions of section 21 (2) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act. The firm was directed to refund the said sum to the Reserve Bank of India on or before 1st April, 1958, failing which it would be recoverable as arrears of land revenue from the firm together with penalty. The order was purported to be passed under section 21 (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1953.

Within a few days thereafter, i.e. on 28th March, 1958, the firm presented an application to the High Court of Bombay under Article 226 of the Constitution for the issue of a writ in nature of certiorari quashing the above mentioned order of forfeiture and for incidental reliefs. In paragraph 4 of the petition it was stated that the order of forfeiture was "without the authority of law and therefore in violation of Art. 19 (1)(g) and Article 265 of the Constitution."

It appears that a similar application had been presented on behalf of Pasha Bhat Patel & Co. (P.) Ltd. to the Bombay High Court and the application of the firm along with the first mentioned application were disposed of by a learned single Judge of the Bombay High Court on 28th November, 1958. The main judgment was delivered in Pasha Bhai Patel and Company's case. The learned Judge observed in the course of his judgment that there was no merit whatsoever in it and "justice did not lie in his (the petitioner's) side and this was a matter in which the Court should not interfere by way of a writ and give relief to the petitioner company." The Judge further observed that "the petitioner has not referred to fundamental rights of any kind in the petition and said:

"This appears to me to be a gross case where even if I was of the opinion that the order is invalid and involved violation of fundamental rights, I would not in my discretion interfere by way of issuing a writ. I am not depriving the petitioner of any other appropriate remedy. I have therefore decided to dismiss this petition on that single ground."

No copy of the petition in Pasha Bhai Patel and Company's case is before as but the present petitioner, as shown already, did complain of violation of Article 19 (1) (g) and Article 265 of the Constitution besides contending that the order was "ultra vires bad and inoperative in law." Dealing with the petition of the firm the learned Judge said that "there was no merit in the case and justice did not lie on the side of the petitioner" and for reasons given in Pasha Bhai Patel and company's case the petition was dismissed.

The firm went up in appeal to the same High Court. A note may be taken of some of the grounds in the memorandum of appeal filed by the firm. They were inter alia:

"(13) The learned Judge erred in not deciding the petition on merits even when there was a question of violation of fundamental rights.

(16) The learned Judge erred in holding that this was a gross case where even if he had been of the opinion that the order was invalid or that it involved violation of fundamental rights, he would not in his discretion interfere by way of issuing a writ.

(30) The learned Judge failed to appreciate that the order of forfeiture was nothing but the deprivation of property without the authority of law and the action of the respondent was an unreasonable restriction on the fundamental rights of the petitioner under Article 19 (1)(f) and Article 31 of the Constitution of India."

In dismissing the appeal the learned Judges of the Division Bench observed:

"The appellant claims to retain with himself amounts to which he has no claim and the appellant is seeking to come before this Court to retain with himself amounts which he has obtained from the sales tax authorities on a representation that he is going to refund the same and which he has not refunded. Mr. Justice K. K. Desai was of the view that the claim made by the appellant was a gross claim and even if it involved violation of fundamental rights, in exercise of his discretion, he will not interfere by issuing a writ. The learned Judge having exercised his discretion which he undoubtedly was entitled to exercise, we do not think sitting in appeal we would be justified in exercising our powers as an appellate Court in interfering with the order under appeal. We may observe that we are not dealing with this case on the merits at all. We have not considered the question whether the appellant is entitled in law to retain the moneys which he has obtained from the sales tax department. We have decided this appeal on the limited ground that Mr. Justice K. K. Desai having exercised his discretion, no case is made out for our interference with the exercise of that discretion."

It is therefore amply clear from the above that the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court did not examine the merits of the firm's contention that the order of refund was without the authority of law or ultra vires or in violation of any fundamental rights of the partners of the firm. They merely exercised their discretion on the question of issue of a writ under Article 226 of the Constitution in view of the firm's conduct in obtaining an order for refund of the amount mentioned and later on refusing to fulfil the condition imposed.

It does not appear that the firm took any further steps in the Court of law for vindicating its position before filing the present writ petition. It received a notice, dated 18th December, 1958, under the Bombay City Land Revenue Act (II of 1876) calling upon it to pay the said sum of Rs. 26,563-50 to the State of Bombay failing which proceedings were threatened to be taken by attachment and sale of its property and by other remedies provided by section 13 of the Land Revenue Act. It appears that the Collector of Bombay actually issued an order of attachment on the right, title and interest of two of the partners of the firm including goodwill and tenancy right in the premises where the business was carried on. The firm paid the sum of Rs. 26,563-50 in various instalments beginning on 3rd October, 1959 and ending on 8th August, 1960.

In paragraph 8 of the present petition to this Court it is submitted that the petitioners "naid the sum to the State of Bombay under coercion and/or mistake of law." The petitioners also state they "did not know that the sections of the Sales Tax Acts under which the said sum was sought to be forfeited and/or recovered and/or retained were ultra vires." In paragraph 10 of the petition it is stated that the petitioners discovered their mistake in law when they came to know of the decision of this Court dated 29th September, 1967, that section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act (V of 1946) was ultra vires. In paragraph 14 of the petition the firm also states :

"that the said sum had been forfeited and/or recovered and/or retained by the respondents from that petitioners in violation of Article 265, Article 31 and Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. The fundamental rights of the petitioners have thus been violated. The petitioners submit that they have been deprived of their property, to wit, the said sum, by the respondents without any authority in law and contrary to the fundamental rights guaranteed to the petitioners by Articles 19 (1) (f) and 31 of the Constitution."

The grounds of law under which the firm claimed that the action of the State of Bombay and the respondents in recovering, retaining, forfeiting and not returning the said sum were void and invalid in law are set forth in paragraph 15 of the petition. In the view which we take of the firm's claim and in view of the decision of this Court in *Kantilal Babulal and Brothers v. H. C. Patel*¹ dated 29th September, 1967, it is not necessary to examine the validity or otherwise of the provisions of section 12-A (4) of the Act of 1946 or the corresponding section of the Act of 1953, i.e., section 21 (4). The appeal of Kantilal Babulal and Brothers v. H. C. Patel decided by this Court on 29th September, 1967, was from a decision of the High Court of Gujarat reported in 16 Sales Tax Cases 973. The Gujarat High Court had held that section 12-A (4) was saved by Article 19 (5) of the Constitution. The appeal by the assessee was allowed by this Court on the short ground that assuming that section 12-A (4) was a penal provision within the legislative competence of the Legislature, it was violative of Article 19 (1) (f) inasmuch as it did not lay down any procedure for ascertaining whether in fact the dealer concerned had collected any amount by way of tax from his purchasers outside the State and if so what that amount was. It was further observed that the section did not contemplate any adjudication nor did it provide for making any order and on a reasonable interpretation of the impugned provision it was observed "that the power conferred under section 12-A (4) was unguided, uncanalised and uncontrolled." On the above reasoning the Court held that the provisions in section 12-A (4) were not a reasonable restriction on the fundamental right guaranteed under Article 19 (1) within the meaning of Article 19 (5).

To establish that the payments totalling Rs. 26,563-50 made in the years 1959 and 1960 were under a mistake of law, the petitioners must satisfy the Court that they paid the money under a genuine belief that the law allowed it but that they later discovered that they were under no legal obligation to pay. Repayment of money paid under a mistake is provided for by section 72 of the Indian Contract Act occurring in Chapter V of the said Act which deals with certain relations resembling those created by a contract. It reads :

"A person to whom money has been paid, or anything delivered, by mistake or under coercion, must repay or return it."

It was laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *Sri Sri Shiba Prasad Singh, deceased now represented by Kali Prasad Singha v. Maharaja Srish Chandra Nandi*¹ that "Payment 'by mistake' in section 72 must refer to a payment which was not legally due and which could not be enforced: 'the mistake' is thinking that the money paid was due when in fact it was not due."

The above decision of the Judicial Committee was relied on by this Court in *Sales Tax Officer v. Kanhaiya Lal Mukundlal Saraf*² where it was said :

"The Privy Council decision has set the whole controversy at rest and if it is once established that the payment, even though it be of a tax, has been made by the party labouring under a mistake of law the party is entitled to recover the same and the party receiving the same is bound to repay or return it. No distinction can therefore be made in respect of a tax liability and any other liability on a plain reading of section 72 of the Contract Act...."

In *Mukundlal's case*² the respondent firm had paid sales tax in respect of its forward transactions in pursuance of the assessment orders passed by the Sales Tax Officer for the years 1949 to 1951. The levy of sales tax on forward transactions being held to be ultra vires by the High Court of Allahabad by its judgment delivered on 27th February, 1952, in the case of *Budh Prakash Jai Prakash v. Sales Tax Officer, Kanpur*³, the respondent by its letter dated 8th July, 1952 asked for a refund of the amount of sales tax paid by it under assessment orders passed on 31st May, 1949, 30th October, 1950 and 22nd August, 1951. The Commissioner of Sales-Tax, U.P., refused to refund the amount claimed by letter dated 19th July, 1952. The above judgment of the Allahabad High Court was confirmed by this Court on 3rd May, 1954, see *Sales-Tax Officer Pilibhit v. Budh Prakash Jai Prakash*⁴. In the meanwhile the respondent had filed a Writ Petition No. 355 of 1952 in the High Court for quashing the assessment orders which was allowed by an order of a single Judge on 30th November, 1954. The appellants' Special Appeal from the said order contending that money paid under a mistake of law was irrecoverable being dismissed, a further appeal was taken to this Court under a certificate. On the facts of that case the Court held that both the parties were labouring under a mistake of law the legal position as established later as by the decision of the Allahabad High Court in *Budh Prakash Jai Prakash v. The Sales Tax Commissioner, Kanpur*¹, subsequently confirmed by this Court in *Sales Tax Officer, Pilibhit v. Budh Prakash Jai Prakash*² not having been known to the parties at the relevant time. This mistake of law had become apparent only on 3rd May, 1954 when this Court confirmed the decision of the Allahabad High Court in *Sales Tax Officer, Pilibhit v. Budh Prakash Jai Prakash*² observing :

"On that position being established the respondent became entitled to recover back the said amounts which had been paid by mistake of law. The state of mind of the respondent would be the only thing relevant to consider in this context and once the respondent established that the payments were made by it under a mistake of law. . . . it was entitled to recover back the said amounts and the State of U. P. was bound to repay or return the same to the respondent irrespective of any other consideration. . . . On a true interpretation of section 72 of the Indian Contract Act, the only two circumstances there indicated as entitling the party to recover the money back are that the moneys must have been paid by mistake or under coercion".

In *State of Madhya Pradesh v. Bhailal Bhai*³ this Court had to deal with 31 appeals arising out of an equal number of applications filed before the Madhya Pradesh High Court contending that the taxing provisions under which the tax was assessed and collected from the petitioners (the Madhya Pradesh Sales Tax Act) infringed Article 301 of the Constitution and did not come within the special provision of Article 304 (a). In all the petitions a prayer was made for refund of the taxes collected. The High Court allowed the prayer for refund in 24 applications but rejected the same in the other applications. This Court agreed with the decision of the High Court that the imposition of the tax contravened the provisions of Article 301 of the Constitution and was not within the saving provisions of Article 304 (a) and on that view observed that the payment was made under a mistake within section 72 of the Indian Contract Act and so the Government to whom the payment had been made must repay it. The tax provisions under which these taxes had been assessed and paid were declared void by the High Court of Madhya Bharat in their decision in *Mohammed Siddique v. The State of Madhya Bharat*⁴ on 17th January, 1956. The respondents claimed to have discovered their mistake in making the payments after they came to know of these decisions. Sixteen of the applications out of 31 were made to the High Court within three years from 17th January, 1956 and the High Court took the view that this was not an unreasonable delay and in that view ordered refund. The High Court also ordered refund in seven other applications made more than three years and eight months after the said 17th January, 1956.

This Court although of opinion that the High Court had power for the purpose of enforcement of fundamental rights and statutory rights to give consequential relief by ordering repayment of money realised by the Government without the authority of law, observed :

"At the same time we cannot lose sight of the fact that the special remedy provided in Article 226 is not intended to supersede completely the modes of obtaining relief by an action in a civil Court or to deny defences legitimately open in such actions. It has been made clear more than once that the power to give relief under Article 226 is a discretionary power. This is specially true in the case of power to issue writs in the nature of mandamus. Among the several matters which the Courts rightly take into consideration in the exercise of that discretion is the delay made by the aggrieved party in seeking this special remedy and what excuse there is for it. Thus, where, as in these cases, a person comes to the Court for relief under Article 226 on the allegation that he has been assessed to tax under a void legislation and having paid it under a mistake is entitled to get it back, the Court, if it finds that the assessment was void, being made under a void provision of law, and the payment was made by mistake, is still not bound to exercise its discretion directing repayment. Whether repayment should be ordered in the exercise of this discretion will depend in each case on its own facts and circumstances. It is not easy nor is it desirable to lay down any rule of universal application. It may however be stated as a general rule that if there has been unreasonable delay the Court ought not ordinarily to lend its aid to a party by this extraordinary remedy of mandamus. Again, where even if there is no such delay the Government or the statutory authority against whom the consequential relief is prayed for raises a prima facie triable issue as regards the availability of such relief on the merits on grounds like limitation, the Court should ordinarily refuse to issue the writ of mandamus for such payment. In both these kinds of cases it will be sound use of discretion to leave the party to seek his remedy by the ordinary mode of action in a civil Court and to refuse to exercise in his favour the extraordinary remedy under Article 226 of the Constitution."

In State of Kerala v. Aluminium Industries Ltd.,¹ the respondents after submitting returns under the Sales Tax Act for the period 30th May, 1950 to 31st March, 1951, showing a net turnover exceeding Rs. 23 lakhs and depositing necessary sales tax claimed a refund on the ground of having discovered their mistake soon after 7th March, 1951. The petition to the Kerala High Court under Article 226 of the Constitution was opposed on behalf of the State on various grounds. Holding that money paid under a mistake of law was recoverable, this Court called for a finding from the Sales Tax Officer on the question whether the writ petition was within three years of the date on which the mistake first became known to the respondent so that a suit for refund on that date would not be barred under Article 96 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1908.

Speaking for myself I am not satisfied that the petitioners in this case had made a mistake in thinking that the money paid was due when in fact it was not due. As already noted, in their reply to the show cause notice dated 7th February, 1958, the petitioners' case was that the threat of the sales tax authorities to forfeit the amount was without the authority of law and that the firm had agreed to the condition of refunding the amount received to its own customers under coercion even though in law the authorities were bound to refund without any such condition. The petitioners did not content themselves merely by opposing the claim of the sales tax authorities to forfeit the amount but suited their action to their belief by presenting a writ petition to Bombay High Court describing the order of forfeiture as without the authority of law and in violation of Article 19 (1) (g) and Article 265 of the Constitution and praying for the necessary reliefs. They did not accept the decision of the learned single Judge of the Bombay High Court under Article 226 of the Constitution but filed their appeal raising practically the same contentions as they have done in the present petition except that they did not state having discovered any mistake on a perusal of the decision of any Court of law. The grounds of appeal to the the Divisional Bench of the Bombay High Court are illustrative of the frame of mind and viewpoint of the petitioners then. They complained about the violation of their fundamental rights, the illegality of the order of forfeiture and in particular mentioned the unreasonable restriction on their fundamental rights enshrined in Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution. Further, they had the benefit of the judgment of the appeal Bench of the Bombay High Court that the case was not being decided on the merits at all and even if there was any violation of the fundamental rights of the petitioners the exercise of discretion by the learned single Judge would not be interfered with in appeal.

It was therefore clear to the petitioners that there was no adjudication as to their fundamental rights or the merits of their claim and there was nothing to prevent the petitioners then from coming up to this Court by preferring an appeal from the judgment of the Bombay High Court or by instituting a suit for declaration of the order of forfeiture illegal and ultra vires and for an injunction restraining the State from giving effect thereto. Before the Bombay High Court the petitioners questioned the legality of the order of forfeiture and prayed for quashing it on the ground of the threatened invasion of their fundamental rights. On these facts it is idle to suggest that the petitioners ever entertained any belief or thought that the money was legally due from them. The way they asserted their position under the law precludes any inference that they were ever influenced by a mistake of law or that they ever failed to appreciate the correct position under the law. Even after the decision of the Bombay High Court they did not willingly pay up the amount forfeited but only made disbursements after an attachment had been levied on the business including the tenancy of the premises and its good will. They protested against the order of forfeiture not only out of Court but in Court and only paid after the issue of a legal process.

It is therefore not possible to hold that the payments complained of following the order of forfeiture were made in mistake of law. They were payments under compulsion or coercion. A payment under coercion has to be treated in the same way for the purpose of a claim to refund as a payment under mistake of law, but there is an important distinction between the two. A payment under mistake of law may be questioned only when the mistake is discovered but a person who is under no misapprehension as to his legal rights and complains about the illegality or the ultra vires nature of the order passed against him can immediately after payment formulate his cause of action as one of payment under coercion.

The Limitation Acts do not in terms apply to claims against the State in respect of violation of fundamental rights. A person complaining of infraction of any such right has one of three courses open to him. He can either make an application under Article 226 of the Constitution to a High Court or he can make an application to this Court under Article 32 of the Constitution, or he can file a suit asking for appropriate reliefs. The decision of various High Courts in India have firmly laid down that in the matter of the issue of a writ under Article 226 the Courts have a discretion and may in suitable cases refuse to give relief to the person approaching it even though on the merits the applicant has a substantial complaint as regards violation of fundamental rights. Although the Limitation Act does not apply, the Courts have refused to give relief in cases of long unreasonable delay. As noted above in *Bhailal Bhais case*¹, it was observed that the "Maximum period fixed by the Legislature as the time within which the relief by a suit in a civil Court must be brought may ordinarily be taken to be a reasonable standard by which delay in seeking remedy under Article 226 can be measured". On the question of delay, we see no reason to hold that a different text ought to be applied when a party comes to this Court under Article 32 from one applicable to applications under Article 226. There is a public policy behind all statutes of limitation and according to Halsbury's Laws of England (Third Edition Vol. 24) Article 330 at p. 181:

"The Courts have expressed at least three different reasons supporting the existence of statutes of limitation, namely, (1) that long dormant claims have more of cruelty than justice in them, (2) that a defendant might have lost the evidence to disprove a stale claim and (3) that persons with good causes of action should pursue them with reasonable diligence."

In my view, a claim based on the infraction of fundamental rights ought not to be entertained if made beyond the period fixed by the Limitation Act for the enforcement of the right by way of suit. While not holding that the Limitation Act applies in terms I am of the view that ordinarily the period fixed by the Limitation Act should be taken to be a true measure of the time within which a person can be allowed to raise a plea successfully under Article 32 of the Constitution. Article 16 of the Limitation Act of 1908 fixed a period of one year for a suit against Government to recover money paid under protest in satisfaction of a claim made by the revenue authorities on account of arrears of revenue or on account of demands recoverable as such arrears, from the date when the payment was made. As an attachment was levied under section 13 of the Bombay City Land Revenue Act (II of 1876) it is a moot question as to whether the payments made in 1959 and 1960 in this case would not attract the said article of the Limitation Act of 1908. It was held by this Court in *A. V. Subbarao v. The State*¹ that the period of limitation for a suit to recover taxes illegally collected was governed by Article 62 of the Limitation Act of 1908 providing a space of three years from the date of payment. But taking the most favourable view of the petitioners' case, Article 120 of the Limitation Act of 1908 giving a period of six years for the filing of a suit would apply to the petitioners' claim. The period of six years would have expired some time in 1966 but the Limitation Act of 1908 was repealed by the Limitation Act of 1963 and by section 30 (a) of the Act of 1963 it was provided that:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act—

(a) any suit for which the period of limitation is shorter than the period of limitation prescribed by the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, may be instituted within a period of five years next after the commencement of this Act, or within the period prescribed for such suit by the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, whichever period expires earlier:

(b) **

**

A claim for money paid under coercion would be covered by Article 113 of the Limitation Act, 1963 giving a period of three years from the first of January, 1964, on which date the Act came into force. The period of limitation for a suit which was formerly covered by Article 120 of the Act of 1908 would in case like this be covered by Article 113 of the new Act and the suit in this case would have to be filed by the 1st January, 1967. As the petition to this Court was presented in February, 1968, a suit, if filed, would have been barred and in my view the petitioners' claim in this case cannot be entertained having been preferred after the 1st of January, 1967. The facts negative any claim of payment under a mistake of law and are only consistent with a claim for money paid under coercion. As the petitioners have come to this Court long after the date when they could have properly filed a suit, the application must be rejected.

I may also note in brief another contention urged on behalf of respondents that the present petition is barred by principles analogous to res judicata. It was contended by learned Counsel for the respondents that the decisions of the Bombay High Court were speaking orders and even if the petition to the Bombay High Court had been dismissed in limine there would be a decision on the merits. I am unable to uphold this contention. It was held in *Daryao and others v. The State of U. P. and others*¹, that when a petition under Article 226 is dismissed not on the merits but because of laches on the party applying for the writ or because an alternative remedy is available to him, such dismissal is no bar to the subsequent petition under Article 32 except in cases where the facts found by the High Court might themselves be relevant under Article 32. It was pointed out in *Joseph v. State of Kerala*² that:

"Every citizen whose fundamental right is infringed by the State has a fundamental right to approach this Court for enforcing his right. If by a final decision of a competent Court his title to property has been negatived, he ceases to have the fundamental right in respect of that property and, therefore, he can no longer enforce it. In that context the doctrine of res judicata may be invoked. But where there is no such decision at all, there is no scope to call in its aid."

The judgment of the Bombay High Court in 1958 clearly shows that the merits of the petitioners' claim were not being examined. I can however find no merit in the contention that because there is an invasion of a fundamental right of a citizen he can be allowed to come to this Court, no matter how long after the infraction of his right he applies for relief. The Constitution is silent on this point; nor is there any statute of limitation expressly applicable, but nevertheless, on grounds of public policy I would hold that this Court should not lend its aid to a litigant even under Article 32 of the Constitution in case of an inordinate delay in asking for relief and the question of delay ought normally to be measured by the periods fixed for the institution of suits under the Limitation Acts.

The petition therefore fails and is dismissed with costs.

Hedge, J.—I had the advantage of studying the judgments just delivered by my brothers Sikri, Bhachawat and Mitter, JJ. The facts of the case are fully set out in those judgments. I shall not restate them.

I agree with the decision of Mitter, J., that to the facts of this case the rule laid down by this Court in *Daryao Rao and others v. The State of U. P. and others*³ is inapplicable. The principle underlying that decision as I understand, is that the right claimed by the petitioner therein had been negatived by a competent Court and that decision having become final, as it was not appealed against, he could not agitate the same over again. It is in that context the principle of res judicata was relied on. A fundamental right can be sought to be enforced by a person who possesses that right. If a competent Court holds that he had no such right, that decision is binding on him. The binding character of judgments of Courts of competent jurisdiction is in essence a part of the rule of law on which administration of justice depends.

In view of the decision of this Court in *Kantilal Babulal and Brothers v. H. C. Patel*⁴ that section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946 is violative of Article 19 (1) (f) of the Constitution on the grounds that that section did not lay down any procedure for ascertaining whether in fact the dealer concerned had collected any amount by way of tax from its purchasers outside the State and if so what amount that was; neither the section nor any rule framed under the Act contemplated any enquiry much less a reasonable enquiry in which the dealer complained of could plead and prove his case or satisfy the authorities that their assumptions were wholly or partly wrong and further the section also did not provide for any enquiry on disputed questions of fact or law or for making an order, it follows that the impugned collection was without the authority of law and consequently the same is an exaction resulting in the infringement of one of the proprietary rights of the petitioners guaranteed to them under Article 19 (1)(f) of the Constitution. Hence the petitioners have a fundamental right to approach this Court under Article 32 of our Constitution for appropriate relief and this Court has a duty to afford them appropriate relief. In *Kahrak Singh v. The State of U. P. and others*¹: Rajagopala Ayyangar, J., speaking for the majority observed that once it is proved to the satisfaction of this Court that by State action the fundamental right of a petitioner has been infringed it is not only the right but the duty of this Court under Article 32 to afford relief to him by passing appropriate orders in that behalf. The right given to the citizens to move this Court under Article 32 is itself a fundamental right and the same cannot be circumscribed or curtailed except as provided by the Constitution. It is inappropriate to equate the duty imposed on this Court to the powers of the Chancery Court in England or the equitable jurisdiction of the American Courts. A duty imposed by the Constitution cannot be compared with discretionary powers under Article 32, the mandate of the Constitution is clear and unambiguous and that mandate has to be obeyed. It must be remembered, as emphasized by several decisions of this Court that this Court is charged by the Constitution with the special responsibility of protecting and enforcing the fundamental rights under Part III of the Constitution. If I may with respect, borrow the felicitous language employed by Chief Justice Patanjali Sastri in *State of Madras v. V. G. Rao*², that as regards fundamental rights this Court has been assigned the role of a Sentinel on the qui vive. The anxiety of this Court not to whittle down the amplitude of the fundamental rights guaranteed has found expression in several of its judgments. It has not allowed its vision to be blurred by the fact that some of the persons who invoked its powers had no equity in their favour. It always took care to see that a bad case did not end in laying down a bad law. I am not unaware of the fact that the petitioners before us have no equity in their favour but that circumstances is irrelevant in deciding the nature of the right available to an aggrieved party under Article 32 of the Constitution.

All of us are unanimous on the question that the impugned collection amounts to an invasion of one of the fundamental rights guaranteed to the petitioners. Our difference primarily centres round the question whether their right to get relief under Article 32 is subject to any limitation or to be more accurate whether this Court has any discretion while exercising its jurisdiction under that Act? As mentioned earlier a right to approach this Court under Article 32 is itself a fundamental right. In that respect our Constitution makes a welcome departure from many other similar Constitutions. As seen earlier a party aggrieved by the infringement of any of its fundamental rights has a right to get relief at the hands of this Court, and this Court has a duty to grant appropriate relief—see *Joseph Pothen v. The State of Kerala*³. The power conferred on this Court by that Article is not a discretionary power. This power is not similar to the power conferred on the High Courts under Article 226 of the Constitution. Hence laches on the part of an aggrieved party cannot deprive him of the right to get relief from this Court under Article 32. A Division

Bench of the Bombay High Court in *Kama'abai Harjivandas Parekh v. T. B. Desai*¹ held that where a constitutional objection to the validity of a legislation is taken in a petition under Article 226, the question of mere delay will not affect the maintainability of that petition. Law reports do not show a single instance, where this Court had refused to grant relief to a petitioner in a petition under Article 32 on the ground of delay.

There has been some controversy whether an aggrieved party can waive his fundamental right. That question was elaborately considered in *Basheshar Nath v. The Commissioner of Income-tax, Delhi, Rajasthan and another*², by a Constitution Bench consisting of S. R. Das, C.J., and Bhagwati, S. K. Das, S. L. Kapur and Subba Rao, JJ. The learned Chief Justice and Kapur, J., held that there could be no waiver of a fundamental right founded on Article 14. Bhagwati and Subba Rao, JJ., held that no fundamental right can be waived and S. K. Das, J., held that only such fundamental rights which are intended to the benefit of a party can be waived. I am mentioning all these aspects to show how jealously this Court has been resisting every attempt to narrow down the scope of the rights guaranteed under Part III of our Constitution.

Admittedly the provisions contained in the Limitation Act do not apply to proceedings under Article 226 or Article 32. The Constitution makers wisely, if I may say with respect, excluded the application of those provisions to proceedings under Articles 226, 227 and 32 lest the efficacy of the constitutional remedies should be left to the tender mercies of the Legislatures. This Court has laid down in *I. C. Golaknath and others v. State of Punjab and another*³, that the Parliament cannot by amending the Constitution abridge the fundamental rights conferred under Part III of the Constitution. If we are to bring in the provisions of Limitation Act by an indirect process to control the remedies conferred by the Constitution it would mean that what the Parliament cannot do directly it can do indirectly by curtailing the period of limitation for suits against the Government. We may console ourselves by saying that the provisions of the Limitation Act will have only persuasive value but they do not limit the power of this Court but the reality is bound to be otherwise. Very soon the line that demarcates the rule of prudents and binding rule is bound to vanish as has happened in the past. The fear that forgotten claims and discarded rights may be sought to be enforced against the Government after lapse of years, if the fundamental rights are held to be enforceable without any time limit appears to be an exaggerated one. It is for the party who complains the infringement of any right to establish his right. As years roll on his task is bound to become more and more difficult. He can enforce only an existing right. A right may be lost due to an earlier decision of a competent Court or due to various other reasons. If a right is lost for one reason or the other there is no right to be enforced. In this case we are dealing with an existing right even if it can be said that the petitioners' remedy under the ordinary law is barred. If the decision of Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., is correct, startling results are likely to follow. Let us take for example a case of a person who is convicted and sentenced to long period of imprisonment on the basis of a statute which had been repealed long before the alleged offence was committed. He comes to know the repeal of the statute long after the period prescribed for filing appeal expires. Under such a circumstance according to the decision of Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., he will have no right—the discretion of the Court apart—to move this Court a writ of habeas corpus.

Our Constitution makers in their wisdom thought that no fetters should be placed on the right of an aggrieved party to seek relief from this Court under Article 32. A comparison of the language of Article 226 with that of Article 32 will show that while under Article 226 a discretionary power is conferred on the High Courts the mandate of the Constitution is absolute so far as the exercise of this Court's power under Article 32 is concerned. Should this Court, an institution primarily created for the purpose of safeguarding the fundamental rights guaranteed under Part III of the Constitution, narrow down those rights? The implications of this decision are bound to be far reaching. It is likely to pull down from the high pedestal now occupied by the fundamental rights to the level of other civil rights. I am apprehensive that this decision may mark an important turning point in downgrading the fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution. I am firmly of the view that a relief asked for under Article 32 cannot be refused on the ground of laches. The provision of the Limitation Act have no relevance either directly or indirectly to proceedings under Article 32. Considerations which are relevant in proceedings under Article 226 are wholly out of place in a proceeding like the one before us. The decision of this Court referred to in the judgment of Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., where this Court has taken into consideration the laches on the part of the petitioners are not opposite for our present purpose. None of those cases deal with proceedings under Article 32 of the Constitution. The rule enunciated by this Court in the *State of M. P. v. Bhailal Bhai*¹, is only applicable to proceedings under Article 226. At page 271 of the report Das Gupta, J., who spoke for the Court specifically referred to this aspect when he says:

"that it has been made clear more than once that power to relief under Article 226 is a discretionary power."

Therefore those decisions are of no assistance to us in deciding the present case. Once it is held that the power of this Court under Article 32 is a discretionary power—that in my opinion is the result of the decision of Bachawat and Mitter, JJ.—then it follows that this Court can refuse relief under Article 32 on any one of the grounds on which relief under Article 226 can be refused. Such a conclusion militates not only against the plain words of Article 32 but also the lofty principle underlying that provision. The resulting position is that the right guaranteed under that Article would cease to be a fundamental right.

Assuming that the rule enunciated by this Court in *Sales Tax Officer v. Kanthaya Lal Mukand Lal Saraf*² and further refined by this Court in *State of M. P. v. Bhailal Bhai*¹ can apply to the facts of this case even then I am of opinion that the petitioners are entitled to the relief that they have asked for. As could be gathered from the decision of Bachawat and Mitter, JJ., the Bombay High Court did not decide the merits of the case in the writ petition filed by the petitioners. In that petition the Court refused to exercise its discretion in favour of the petitioners. The grounds on which the petitioners challenged the validity of section 12-A (4) of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1946 before the High Court of Bombay have now been found to be unsustainable by Gujarat High Court in *Kantilal Babulal and Brother v. H. C. Patil*³. In the appeal against that decision this Court did not examine those grounds. It struck down section 12-A (4) on a wholly different ground, a ground not put forward by the petitioners in their writ petition before the Bombay High Court. A mere impression of a party that a provision of law may be ultra vires the Constitution cannot be equated to knowledge that the provision invalid. Hope and desire are not the same things as knowledge. A law passed by a competent Legislature is bound to be presumed to be valid until it is struck down by a competent Court. The fact after a futile attempt to get the provision in question declared invalid the petitioners gave up their fight and submitted to the law which was apparently valid is no proof of the fact that they knew that the provision in question is invalid. As seen earlier that none of the grounds urged by the petitioners in support of their contention that the provision in question is invalid has been accepted by any Court till now. Under these circumstances I see no justification to reject the plea of the petitioners that they became aware of the provision only after the decision of this Court in *Kantilal Babulal's case*¹ which decision was rendered on 29th September, 1967. This petition was filed very soon thereafter. Hence this case under any circumstance falls within the rule laid down by this Court in Bhailal Bhai's case.²

For the reasons mentioned above I allow this petition and grant the relief prayed for by the petitioners.

ORDER:—In accordance with the opinion of the majority, the petition fails and is dismissed with costs:

The State of Andhra Pradesh and another, etc. ... Respondents.

Andhra Pradesh Motor Vehicles (Taxation of Passengers and Goods) Amendment and Validation Act (XXXIV of 1961)—Scope—Constitutional validity—If infringes Article 14 and 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution—Act intended to augment revenues of the State—Previous sanction of President obtained under proviso to Article 304 (b)—Effect—Question of reasonableness of restrictions imposed and of restrictions being in public interest—Powers of Court to go into—Exemption of Telengana area under Notification dated 1st November, 1961—Vehicles on inter-State routes not subject to tax—If discrimination under Article 14—Constitution of India (1950), Articles 14, 19 (1) (g), 301 and 304 (b) Proviso—Scope of.

In the case of a statute, such as the Andhra Pradesh Motor Vehicles (Taxation of Passengers and Goods) Amendment Act, 1961, which was enacted with the object of augmenting the revenues of the State, notwithstanding the fact that the sanction of the President was obtained under the proviso to Article 304 (b) of the Constitution of India, the question of the restrictions being reasonable and in public interest is open to examination by the Court, and the Act can be held to be valid only if it is shown that the restrictions imposed by it are reasonable and in public interest. When the taxes imposed were enhanced the transporters were permitted to enhance the fares, and the burden therefore would not fall on the transporters. If the transport operators are not prepared to charge higher rates of fares as a matter of policy, or for the purpose of business competition, that cannot impinge on the reasonableness of the restriction imposed, particularly when there is nothing to show that the tax imposed exceeds the limits of permissible reasonableness. There is also nothing in the provisions of the Act with regard to imposition of tax, are not in public interest. Hence the Act cannot be challenged under Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution of India.

When it is found that the increase in the surcharge of fees and freight contemplated by the Validating Act of 1961 would not constitute an impediment to the trade, and that the utmost that could be said was that it would result in the diminution of profits, it cannot be said that there is an infringement of Article 19 (1) (g).

Nor can the Act be said to be violative of Article 14, on the ground of discrimination in that it has not been made applicable to the Telengana area while made applicable to the Andhra area or on the ground that the vehicles on the inter-State routes or permits granted by other States (Madras) had not been subjected to tax.

There was no law in the erstwhile Hyderabad State imposing any tax on passengers and goods. After the merger of Telengana and Andhra areas, the laws in force in the Telengana region continued to remain in force under section 119 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956. The Notification issued on 4th November, 1961, under section 19 of Act (X of 1958), exempted passengers, luggage and goods from payment of tax in the Telengana area, and this exemption was granted to the operators in the Telengana area for the reason that before the extension of the parent Act to this area, no tax similar to the one levied under the parent Act was payable in that area and their exemption was granted under a different enactment. Hence the challenge under Article 14 has no force. Since the laws in force in the two States, Madras and Andhra, are different, no question of discrimination can arise when taxes are being imposed under two different sets of laws in different States or geographical limits; and hence it cannot be said that Article 14 is infringed because vehicles on the inter-State routes or permits issued by other States had not been subjected to tax.

Case-law discussed and reviewed.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order dated the 25th October, 1962 of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in Writ Petitions Nos. 1307, 1305 and 1353 of 1961.

K. Srinivasamurthy and Naunit Lal, Advocates, for Appellants (In all the Appeals).

P. Ram Reddy, Senior Advocate, (P. Parameshwara Rao, Advocate, with him), for Respondent No. 1 (In all the Appeals).

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Grover, J.— These appeals by certificate from a judgment of the Andhra Pradesh High Court which disposed of several petitions under Article 226 of the Constitution including the petitions filed by the appellants involve the question of the constitutionality of the Andhra Pradesh Motor Vehicles (Taxation of Passengers and Goods) Amendment and Validation Act, 1961, Andhra Pradesh Act (XXXIV of 1961).

The appellants hold permits either for stage carriage or for public carriers issued under the Motor Vehicles Act, 1939. They ply these vehicles on different routes in the State as also on some of the inter-State routes. They were subject to tax levied under the Madras Motor Vehicles Taxation Act, 1931.

In 1952, the Madras Motor Vehicles (Taxation of Passengers and Goods) Act, (XVI of 1952) was enacted by which every operator had to pay Rs. 12.50 per seat per quarter or 37 nai paise per seat per mile over and above the tax payable under the Madras Motor Vehicles Taxation Act, 1931. Under that Act the operators were paying tax of Rs. 30 per seat per quarter. The validity of Act (XVI of 1952) was challenged before the Madras High Court. In *Mathurrai Pillay v. The State of Madras*¹ its validity was upheld except as to the proviso to section 3 of the Act. After the formation of Andhra Pradesh State the Governor promulgated an Ordinance amending Madras Act (XVI of 1952) in the light of the above judgment. The provisions contained in the Ordinance were subsequently re-enacted as President's Act (XI of 1954). The operators, therefore, paid taxes imposed under Act (XVI of 1952) as amended in the State of Andhra Pradesh. By means of Act (XXI of 1959) the Legislature of Andhra Pradesh amended Act (XVI of 1952). Section 3 of Act (XVI of 1952) as amended read as follows :

"In clause (a) of sub-rule (i) of rule 1 in the Schedule to the Principal Act, for the words '37 nP. per seat per year per mile' the words Rs. 1.48 nP. per seat per year per mile and for the words Rs. 12.50 nP. per seat per quarter the words Rs. 50 per seat per quarters shall be substituted and clause (b) of the said sub-rule for the words Rs. 22.50 nP. per month the words Rs. 45 per month shall be substituted."

The validity of the Amending Act (XXI of 1959) was challenged by means of writ petitions before the High Court. A Division Bench struck down the impugned provisions as unconstitutional and ultra vires on the ground that since that Act imposed a restriction on the operator's freedom of trade and commerce under Article 301 of the Constitution the previous sanction of the President was necessary under the proviso to section 304 (b) and because that had not been obtained the Act was legally inoperative: *Venson Transport v. The State of Andhra Pradesh*¹. Subsequently Act (XXXIV of 1961) was enacted after the sanction of the President was obtained to the Bill under the proviso to Article 304 (b). It validated two acts, namely, Act (XXI of 1959) and Act (XXII of 1959) and also amended Act (XVI of 1952) and substituted sub-section (3) of section 3 of that Act by a new sub-section. It further validated the realisation of the tax paid or payable and the fee paid or payable and other action taken under Act (XXI of 1959) and Act (XXII of 1959). It empowered the Government to levy additional tax at the rate of Rs. 50 per seat per quarter from 8th May, 1959 to 16th January, 1961. Thereafter from 17th January, 1961 to 3rd November, 1961, the rate was fixed at Rs. 12.50 per seat per quarter. After the commencement of the Validating Act (XXXIV of 1961) the rate was to be Rs. 37.50 per seat per quarter. This was to be operative till 1st April, 1962, when the Act would cease to have any effect.

The validity and constitutionality of Validating Act (XXXIV of 1961) were challenged by means of various petitions under Article 226 of the Constitution. It was sought to be contended before the High Court that the impugned legislation was not regulatory in character. The sole object was to argument the revenue of the State. This brought the statute within the mischief of Article 301 of the Constitution. The High Court was of the view that the question whether the statute was regulatory or compensatory was relevant in the context of Part XIII of the Constitution only in the event of non-compliance with the proviso to Article 304 (b) of the Constitution. As the previous sanction of the President had been obtained in terms of the proviso such points could no longer be canvassed. The challenge on the ground of Article 14 before the High Court also failed. An argument was addressed that the impugned Act was repugnant to Article 19 (1) (g) of the Constitution. The reasonableness of the restriction within the meaning of Article 304 (b) also came up for consideration. The High Court, in the light of the facts and figures placed before it; held that the increase in surcharge of the fares and freights contemplated by the impugned Act did not constitute an impediment to the trade of the transporters and that the restriction in the shape of additional imposts was not unreasonable. It is unnecessary to refer to the other points agitated before and decided by the High Court.

Counsel for the appellant has urged the following points before us:

(1) The impugned Act imposed a tax for augmenting the revenues of the State. It was neither regulatory nor compensatory in nature and it fell directly within the mischief of Article 301 of the Constitution.

(2) Even though there had been compliance with the proviso to Article 304 (b) in the matter of obtaining the requisite sanction it was open to the Court to go into the question of reasonableness both with reference to the aforesaid provision and Article 19 (1) (g) read with clause (6) of that Article. The Court was equally entitled to determine whether the imposition was in the public interest.

(3) The impugned Act violated Article 14 of the Constitution and was discriminatory inasmuch as (a) it had not been made applicable to the Telengana area although it was applicable to the Andhra area, and (b) the vehicles on inter-State routes on permits granted by other States had not been subjected to tax.

In order to decide these points the principles which have been settled by this Court with regard to Article 301 and Article 304 (b) may be noted. According to the majority view in *Automobile Transport (Rajasthan) Ltd. v. The State of Rajasthan and others*¹ if a tax is compensatory in character it cannot be said to fall within the mischief of Article 301. Subba Rao, J., (as he then was), who concurred in the majority decision but delivered a separate judgment preferred to rest his view on the regulatory nature of such taxing statute as would escape the mischief of Article 301. In *Khyerbari Tea Co. Ltd. and Anr. v. The State of Assam*², the difference between the view expressed in the *Automobile Transport (Rajasthan) case*¹, and an earlier decision is *Atiabari Tea Co. Ltd. v. State of Assam and others*³, with regard to the scope and effect of the provisions of Article 304 (b) was noticed. It was observed that according to the majority view expressed in *Atiabari Tea Co. case*³, if the Act is passed under Article 304 (b) and its validity is impeached the State may seek to justify the Act on the ground that the restrictions imposed by it are reasonable and in public interest and in doing so it may rely on the fact that the taxes levied by the impugned Act are compensatory in character. On the other hand, according to the majority decision in the *Automobile Transport (Rajasthan) case*¹, compensatory taxation would be outside Article 301 and cannot fall under Article 304 (b). Since it was not urged that the tax was of a compensatory nature in *Khyerbari Tea Co. Ltd. case*², this Court proceeded to examine whether the restrictions imposed by the statute impugned in that case were reasonable and in public interest within the meaning of Article 304 (b). The effect of compliance with the provisions of the proviso to Article 304 (b) by obtaining the previous sanction of the President to the Bill was also considered and it has been laid down that notwithstanding the sanction the question of the restrictions being reasonable and in public interest is open to examination by the Court. The Act can be held to be valid only if it is shown that the restrictions imposed by it are reasonable and in public interest.

It has not been contended on behalf of the State that the impugned Validating Act imposes a tax which is by way of a regulatory or compensatory measure. It has, therefore, to be seen whether the restriction imposed are reasonable and in public interest within the meaning of Article 304 (b). Before the High Court an attempt was made on behalf of the appellants to show that by raising the rate of tax the burden had been increased to such an extent that the business of the appellants had been virtually annihilated. According to some of the affidavits filed on behalf of the writ petitioners, profits derived in recent years did not exceed an average of Rs. 2,000 per stage carriage even without the additional burden which had been imposed and the transporters would suffer heavy losses if the tax as increased by the impugned legislation were to be realized. The High Court referred to the computation of the income by the Income-tax Department of some of the transporters in whose assessments the income in regard to each bus had been calculated at a figure of Rs. 7,000 annually, which showed that the profits were much higher than Rs. 2,000. It was not disputed before the High Court that the transporters had been permitted to enhance the fares. If the fares could be enhanced it was obvious that the burden would not fall on the transporters. It was urged that owing to competition from the railways and from operators whose vehicles had been registered in the Madras State and who could charge lower rates the appellants were not in a position to collect extra fares which they had been permitted to do. This argument also cannot hold and was rightly repelled by the High Court on the ground that if the operators were not prepared to charge higher rates as a matter of policy or for the purpose of business competition that could not impinge on the reasonableness of the restriction. Apart from a faint attempt to repeat some of the arguments which were addressed before the High Court on this point nothing new has been brought to our notice which would justify the view that the tax which has been imposed exceeds the limits of permissible reasonableness. As regards public interest we are unable to find nor has any attempt been made to satisfy us that the provisions of the impugned Validating Act with regard to imposition of tax are not in public interest.

This is sufficient to dispose of the challenge under Article 19 (1) (g) as well. We may in this connection refer briefly to the conclusion of the High Court which was reached on a consideration of the affidavits filed before it. It has been found that there is no material which would warrant the conclusion that the increase in the surcharge of the fares and freight contemplated by the impugned Validating Act would constitute an impediment to the trade. The utmost that could be said was that it would result in the diminution of profits. Even on the assumption that the profits would be diminished or greatly reduced it cannot be held that there is any infringement of Article 19 (1) (g).

Coming to the attack on the ground of violation of Article 14 reference may be made to the background relating to taxation of passengers and goods carried in motor vehicles in the State prior to the formation of Andhra Pradesh. It appears that there was no law in the erstwhile Hyderabad State imposing any tax on passengers and goods. After the merger of Telengana and Andhra areas the laws in operation in the Telengana region continued to remain in force by virtue of the provisions of section 119 of the States Reorganisation Act, 1956. By Act (X of 1958) the State of Andhra Pradesh amended Act (XVI of 1952) inter alia extending that Act, to the Telengana area. This Act (X of 1958) also amended the Principal Act by adding section 19 according to which the Government could grant an exemption by means of a notification in respect of any motor vehicle running in a particular area. On 4th November, 1961, a notification was issued exempting passengers, luggage and goods carried in stage carriages from payment of tax under the aforesaid Act within the Telengana area. There can be no manner of doubt that this exemption was given to the operators in the Telengana region for the reason that before the extension of the parent Act to this area no tax similar to the one levied under the parent Act was payable in that area and that this exemption was granted under a different enactment. It is apparent that for these reasons the challenge under Article 14 cannot succeed. The same is the position with regard to the tax payable by the appellants and that which the transporters having permits for inter-State routes have to pay. As has been pointed out in the affidavits filed on behalf of the State the laws in the two States, Madras and Andhra Pradesh are different and persons having primary permits from Madras are naturally governed by the laws operating in that State. No question of discrimination can arise when taxes are being imposed under two different sets of laws in different States or geographical areas.

The appeals, therefore, fail and are dismissed with costs. One hearing fee.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Articles 142 and 144—Scope—Suit for possession on basis of title alleging purchase and possession for over 12 years prior to suit—Plea of denial of title of plaintiff and adverse possession—Finding that plaintiff's title not proved but that possession within 12 years of suit was established—Defendants found to be trespassers and providing no proof of possession or adverse possession—Decree on basis of possessory title—If justified—Possessory title—Value of.

Possessory title is a good title as against everybody other than the lawful owner and a trespasser or wrongdoer cannot defeat the lawful possession of a person who has proved possession for more than twelve years by ousting him from the property.

Possession is, under the Indian Law, as under the English Law, good title against all but the true owner, and a wrongdoer cannot successfully resist the suit of a person proving prior possession in an action for ejectment, by showing that the title and right to possession are in a third person. It cannot therefore be held that in a suit for possession on the basis of title, the plaintiff cannot succeed unless he proves his title to the suit property as well as its possession within 12 years. If the plaintiff proves possession for a long period prior to suit he can succeed in the suit as against a trespasser who does not prove possession amounting to ouster of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff in 1949 brought a suit for possession of the suit land on the allegation that he purchased the land from one J.K. with other plots under two sale deeds dated 1930, and that he was put in possession and remained in possession about 1945, when the 2nd defendant trespassed on the land and took possession of it. The defendants 1 and 2 denied that the plaintiff had any title or that he was in possession at any time. The first defendant was said to have purchased the property from the 2nd defendant in 1946.

It was found that the plaintiff did not prove his title, but that he was in possession from 1930 to 1945. It was also found that the defendants had not proved their plea of title by adverse possession. The second defendant was not examined in Court at all as a witness to support the plea of adverse possession and no explanation was forthcoming for his non-examination. The first defendant's evidence was found to very little value and he had no knowledge of the property prior to the date of his alleged purchase in 1946.

Held, that the possession of the plaintiff was a sufficient evidence of title as owner against the defendants and that the plaintiff's suit for possession must be decreed.

M. C. Bhandare and K. Rajendra Chaudhuri, Advocates, for Respondent No. 2.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—This appeal has been brought by the 1st defendant in O.S. No. 210 of 1958 on the file of the 1st Additional Judge, City Civil Court, Hyderabad. That was a suit brought by the 1st respondent-plaintiff for possession of the suit property. That suit was dismissed by the Trial Court but in appeal the High Court of Andhra Pradesh reversed the decree of the Trial Court and decreed the plaintiff's suit for possession. Thereupon this appeal has been brought after obtaining a certificate under Article 133 (1) (a), of the Constitution.

The subject-matter of the suit is a piece of land in Himayatnagar measuring 2856 sq. yards. The plaintiff's case is that he purchased this land from one Jamsheer Khan with other plots in the vicinity under two sale deeds marked Exhibits P-2 and P-3; thereafter he was in possession of the same. When he was in possession, the second defendant trespassed into the said property and took possession of the same, thereafter he illegally sold the same to the 1st defendant. The defendants denied the plaintiff's allegations. They denied that the plaintiff had any title to the suit property or that he was in possession of the same at any time. On the other hand they pleaded that the second defendant who had acquired title to the suit property by adverse possession had sold the same to the 1st defendant in the year 1946.

The Trial Court came to the conclusion that the plaintiff has not established his title to the suit property. It also held that the plaintiff has not satisfactorily proved that he was in possession of the suit property at any time. In view of those findings thought that it was not necessary to go into the defendant's plea of adverse possession. In the result it dismissed the plaintiff's suit. In appeal the High Court agreed with the Trial Court that the plaintiff has not proved his title to the suit property. It rejected the plea of the defendants that they have perfected their title to the suit property by adverse possession. But differing from the Trial Court it came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was put into possession of the suit property by his vendor Jamsheer Khan Sahab in about the year 1930 and he was in possession of the same till about the year 1945, when the second defendant trespassed on the same and took possession of it.

In view of the concurrent finding reached by the Trial Court and the High Court that the plaintiff has not proved his title, that question was not reopened in this Court. The finding of the High Court that the defendants have not established their pleas of title by adverse possession was challenged though feebly. It was contended before us that the plaintiff who based his suit on title and prior possession having failed to establish his title, his suit has to fail. Further the finding of the High Court that the plaintiff was in possession of the said property between 1930 to 1945 was also assailed before us.

The appellant claims that he came into the possession of the suit property on the strength of the sale deed executed by the second defendant in his favour on 1st October, 1946. The suit from which this appeal arises was initially instituted on the original side of the High Court of Hyderabad in the year 1949. Therefore to establish his claim of title by adverse possession, the 1st defendant must primarily depend on the fact that the second defendant was in possession of the suit property for a period of over nine years before he sold the same to him. Though the second defendant filed a written statement supporting the case of the 1st defendant and though he was present at the time of hearing on several occasions, he was not examined as a witness in this case to support the plea of adverse possession put forward by the defendants. No explanation is forthcoming for his non-examination. This circumstance goes a long way to discredit the defendant's plea of adverse possession. The 1st defendant's evidence as regards adverse possession is of very little significance as his knowledge of the suit property prior to the date he purchased the same is very little. The only other evidence relied on in support of the plea of adverse possession is that of D.W. 2, Shambhu Prashad who claims to have taken the suit property on lease from the second defendant. The lease deed said to have been executed by him is marked as Exhibit D-1. It is not explained how the 1st defendant came into possession of Exhibit D-1. Though the suit was filed as far back as 1949, Exhibit D-1 was produced into Court for the first time in the year 1960. No explanation has been given for this inordinate delay in producing Exhibit D-1 (an unregistered document) in Court. According to D.W. 2, the 1st defendant knew about this document as far back as 1950. Under these circumstances, the High Court was fully justified in rejecting the testimony of D.W. 2 and not relying on Exhibit D-1. The other evidence adduced by the 1st defendant relating to the plea of adverse possession was not commended for our acceptance. Therefore we need not consider the same. Hence we agree with the High Court that the defendants have failed to establish their plea of adverse possession.

Now coming to the evidence relating to the plaintiff's possession of the suit property from the year 1930 to 1945, we have firstly the oral testimony of the plaintiff. The High Court has accepted the plaintiff's evidence as credit-worthy. The plaintiff is a responsible person. He held important offices both under the State Government as well as under the United Nations. Prima facie his evidence is worthy of acceptance. This would be particularly so in view of the non-examination of the second defendant. The question before the Trial Court and the High Court was whether the plaintiff was in possession of the suit property between 1930 to 1945 or whether the second defendant was in possession of the same during that period? On this aspect, the evidence is really one-sided. The evidence of the plaintiff that he came into possession of the suit property under Exhibits P-2 and P-3 is supported by the recitals in those documents. In considering the question whether Jamsheer Khan, the vendor under Exhibits P-2 and P-3, had put the plaintiff into possession of the suit property, the fact that Jamsheer Khan had no title to the same is not very material. There is no reason to think that the recitals contained in Exhibits P-2 and P-3 as to the delivery of possession are false recitals. There is documentary evidence to show that the plaintiff paid the "Nazul" for the properties purchased by him under Exhibits P-2 and P-3 after his purchase. It is true that those documents do not show how much "Nazul" was paid in respect of the suit property but the second defendant has produced no documents to show that he had paid any 'Nazul' in respect of the suit property. Exhibit P-4 is a stamped revenue receipt on a printed form executed in favour of the plaintiff by the Maqtadar on 16th August 1939 for Rs. 331-14-4. It relates to the lands which belonged to Jamsheer Khan and situate at Narayanguda. Evidently that recital refers to the lands covered by Exhibits P-2 and P-3. It recites that a sum of Rs. 331-14-4 was received from the plaintiff as 'Nazul' for the period from 15th Aban 1338 fasli to the end of the Aban 1346 fasli at the rate of Rs. 41-4-5 per year. The sale under Exhibits P-2 and P-3 was made in 1930. Evidently the 'Nazul' in respect of those properties was in arrears till 1939. The 'Nazul' due under Exhibits P-2 and P-3 comes to Rs. 41 and odd per year as seen from Exhibit P-6.

Exhibit P-5 is a letter dated 11th December, 1937 received by the plaintiff from Mr. J. D. M. Dean (P.W.-2), First Divisional Engineer, Hyderabad City. It relates to the construction of a road from Musheerabad to Bashir Bagh. It states that under the Ferman dated 29th Shaban 56 Hijri, H.E.H. The Nizam was pleased to accord sanction to the acquisition of 20 per cent. of the land without any compensation for the construction of road, from the owners of the land and that for the excess land required, compensation will be paid. That letter further mentions that total area of the land belonging to the plaintiff was 7815 sq. yards out of which 2112 sq. yards were required for the construction of the road. Out of that 1563 sq. yards being the 20 per cent. of the entire area was to be taken without any compensation and the value of the remaining 549 sq. yards will be paid to the plaintiff. That letter further informed the plaintiff that the value of the additional area which might finally be determined after the marking may be obtained from the department. It is established that road from Musheerabad to Bashir Bagh was laid not only across the plot covered under Exhibit P-3 but also across the site purchased under Exhibit P-2 in which the suit land is situate. That was obvious because if the road did not touch any portion of Exhibit P-2, the entire area of the land belonging to plaintiff would have been only 5114 sq. yards and not 7815 sq. yards as mentioned in Exhibit P-5. It also establishes that the plaintiff was recognised by the City Improvement Board as the person entitled to compensation in respect of that land. Evidence further discloses that the plaintiff was paid compensation in respect of the land taken from him in excess of 20 per cent. referred to earlier. The oral evidence adduced in the case coupled with Exhibits P-2, P-4 and P-5 satisfactorily establishes the fact that the plaintiff was in possession of the suit property till about 1945.

In addition to the evidence referred to earlier, the High Court has also relied on two other documents namely Exhibits D-8 and D-9, but those documents were produced as additional evidence in the High Court. Their connection with the suit property is not satisfactorily established. Therefore we have excluded them from consideration. If we bear in mind the fact that the question for decision is whether the plaintiff or the 2nd defendant was in possession of the suit property between the years 1932 to 1945, there is hardly any doubt that the preponderance of evidence is in favour of the plaintiff's case. As seen earlier, the defendants have not produced any reliable evidence to support their case. Hence we agree with the High Court that the plaintiff has succeeded in establishing that he was in possession of the suit property prior to 1945.

It was next contended on behalf of the appellant that in a suit for possession brought on the basis of title, the plaintiff cannot succeed unless he proves his title to the suit property as well as its possession within 12 years. According to the appellant except in a suit under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, the plaintiffs for succeeding in the suit, has to prove both existing title to the suit property and its possession within 12 years. We are unable to accept this contention as correct. In our opinion the possession of the plaintiff prior to 1945 is a good title against all but the true owner. The defendants who are mere trespassers cannot defeat the plaintiff's lawful possession by ousting him from the suit property. Possessory title is a good title as against everybody other than the lawful owner. In *Ismail Ariff v. Mahomed Ghouse*¹, the Judicial Committee came to the conclusion that a person having possessory title can get a declaration that he was the owner of the land in suit and an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with his possession. There in it was observed that the possession of the plaintiff was a sufficient evidence of title as owner against the defendant.

In Narayana Row v. Dharmachar.² Bench of the Madras High Court consisting of Bashyam Ayyangar and Moore, JJ., held that possession is, under the Indian, as under the English law, good title against all but the true owner. Section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, is in no way inconsistent with the position that as against a wrongdoer, prior possession of the plaintiff, in an action of ejection, is sufficient title, even if the suit be brought more than six months after the act of dispossession complained of and that the wrongdoer cannot successfully resist the suit by showing that the title and right to possession are in a third person. The same view was taken by the Bombay High Court in *Krishna V. Yashvant and others v. Vasudeva Apaji Ghaotikar deceased by lrs*³. That was also the view taken by the Allahabad High Court—see *Umrao Singh v. Ramji Das and others*⁴; *Wali Ahmad Khan and others v. Ajudhia Kandhu*⁵; in *Subodh Gopal Bose v. Province of Bihar and others*⁶ the Patna High Court adhered to the view taken by the Madras, Bombay and Allahabad High Courts. The contrary view taken by the Calcutta High Court in *Deb Churn Bolda v. Issur Chunder Manjee*⁷; *Ertaza Hossein and another v. Bany Mistry*⁸ *Purmeshur Chowdhry and others v. Brijia Lall Chowdhry*⁹ and *Miss Chand Gaita and others v. Kanchiram Bagani*¹⁰ in our opinion does not lay down the law correctly.

In the result this appeal fails and the same is dismissed with costs. We see no reason to accept any additional evidence in this Court. Hence C.M.P. No. 3588 of 1968 is dismissed; but no costs.

tions; first there was a vesting of the Estates in the State absolutely and free of all encumbrances. Then followed the deemed settlement by the state of same rights with the persons mentioned in sections 6 and 9. Therefore in law it would not be correct to say that what vested in the State are only those interests not coming within sections 6 and 9. In view of section 9 all buildings situate within the limits of the Estate held by an intermediary or tenant or other person, whether residing in the village or not continues to be held by him and the site of the buildings within the area appurtenant thereto should be deemed to have been settled with him by the State Government on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed.

It is proper to assume that the law-makers who are representatives of the people enact laws which the society considers as honest, fair and equitable. The object of the very legislation is to advance public welfare. The entire legislative process is influenced by consideration of justice and reason. Justice and reason constitute the great general legislative intent in every piece of legislation consequently where the suggested construction operates harshly, ridiculously or in any other manner, contrary to prevailing conceptions of justice and reason in most instance, it would seem that the apparent or suggested meaning of the statute, was not the one intended by the law-makers. In the absence of some other indication that the harsh or ridiculous effect was actually intended by the Legislature there is little reason to believe that it represents the legislative intent.

It is not possible to believe that the Legislature intended to ignore the rights of persons having legal title to possession and wanted to make gift of any building to a trespasser howsoever recent the trespasser might have been if only he happened to be in physical possession of the building on the date of vesting.

It is true that the Legislature could have used the word "lawfully held" in place of the word "held" in section 9 but one of dictionary meaning given to the word "held" is "lawfully held". The word "held" is technically understood to mean to possess by legal title. Therefore by interpreting the word "held" as "lawfully held" the Court is not adding any word to the section. It is merely spelling out the meaning of that word. It is proper to construe the word "held" in section 9 when used in relation to the words "other person" as meaning "lawfully held" by that person. That interpretation flows from the context in which the word is used.

Held, The scheme of the Act is to abolish all estates and vest the concerned property in the State but at the same time certain rights were conferred on persons in possession of lands or building. It is reasonable to think that the persons who were within the contemplation of the Act are those who were in possession of lands or buildings on the basis of some legal title. The word "held" in section 9 means "lawfully held."

(On facts held, the owners of the old buildings continue to be the owners of the new building).

It is unfortunate that the latter Division Bench should have thought it proper to sit in judgment over the correctness of a decision rendered by a Bench of a co-ordinate jurisdiction. Judicial Propriety requires that if a Bench of a High Court is unable to agree with the decision already rendered by another co-ordinate bench of the same High Court, the question should be referred to a larger bench otherwise the decisions of High Courts will not only lack respect in the eyes of the public, it will also make the task of the subordinate Courts difficult.

Appeal from the Judgment and Decree dated the 24th May, 1961 of the Allahabad High Court in Second Appeal No. 1302 of 1952.

B.C. Misra, Senior Advocate, (G. S. Chatterjee and M.M. Kshatriya, Advocates, of M/s. Kshatriya and Chatterjee, with him), for Appellants.

J.P. Goyal and G.N. Wantoo, Advocates, for Respondents.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hegde, J.—The scope of section 9 of the U.P. Zamindari Abolition and Land Reforms Act, 1950 (U.P. Act I of 1951) (to be hereinafter referred to as the Act) comes up for decision in this appeal by certificate.

The facts relevant for deciding this appeal are no more in dispute. The respondents were Ryots under the appellants in village Nagli Abdulla, a hamlet of village Muchhra. The site of the building in dispute in this appeal had been taken by the father of the respondents from the appellants' ancestors over 6 years ago and thereafter the respondents put up some buildings on that site for their residential purposes. During the communal disturbances in 1947 they left the village temporarily as a measure of safety and took shelter with some of their relations in some other village at a distant place. They came back to their village in the year 1949 when the conditions improved. At that time they found the appellants occupying that site after putting up a cowshed on the site in which their residential building stood. Those residential buildings had been demolished and the site in question included as a part of the house of the appellants. As the appellants refused to deliver possession of the suit property, the respondents instituted a suit for possession of the same on 9th January, 1951.

On 26th January, 1951, the Act came into force. Section 4 of the Act provided for the vesting of the Estates in the State. It prescribes that as soon as may be after the commencement of the Act, the State Government may, by notification, declare that, as from a date to be specified, all Estates situate in Uttar Pradesh shall vest in the State and as from the beginning of the date so specified, all such Estates shall stand transferred to and vest, except otherwise provided in the Act, in the State free from all encumbrances. Section 6 of the Act enumerates the consequences of the vesting of an Estate in the State. Section 9 deals with the buildings in the abadi. Reading sections 4, 6 and 9 together, it follows that all Estates notified under section 4 vest in the State free from all encumbrances. The qundam proprietors or tenure holders of those Estates lose all interests in those Estates. As proprietors or tenure holders they retain no interest in respect of them whatsoever. But in respect of the lands or buildings enumerated in section 6 and section 9, the State settled on the persons who held them certain rights. Though in fact the vesting of the Estates and the deemed settlement of some rights in respect of certain classes of lands or buildings included in the Estate took place simultaneously, in law the two must be treated as different transactions; first there was a vesting of the Estates in the State absolutely and free of all encumbrances. Then followed the deemed settlement by the State of some rights with the persons mentioned in sections 6 and 9. Therefore in law it would not be correct to say that what vested in the State are only those interests not coming within sections 6 or 9; see—*Rana Sheo Anwar Singh v. Allahabad Bank Ltd., Allahabad*¹. In this connection reference may also usefully be made to the decision of this Court in *Shivashankar Prasad Shah and others v. Veekunth Nath Singh and others*² a decision rendered under the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950, the relevant provisions of which are similar to the provisions of the Act. In this case notification under section 4 of the Act was issued on 1st July, 1952. Hence the vesting contemplated under section 4 took place on that date.

Section 9 of the Act, the section with which we are concerned in this case, reads thus :

“All wells, trees in abadi, and all buildings situated within the limits of an estate, belonging to or held by an intermediary or tenant or other persons, whether residing in the village or not, shall continue to belong to or be held by such intermediary or tenant or person, as the case may be, and the site of the wells or the buildings within the area appurtenant thereto shall be deemed to be settled with him by the State Government on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed.”

In view of that provision all buildings situate within the limits of an Estate held by an intermediary or tenant or other person, whether residing in the village or not continues to be held by him and the site of the buildings within the area appurtenant thereto should be deemed to have been settled with him by the State Government on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed.

As seen earlier till about 1947, the respondents were lawfully holding the buildings and the site with which we are concerned in this case as Ryots. They never gave up their possession of the buildings voluntarily. The fact that they vacated those buildings and took shelter with their relations during the time of the communal disturbances cannot be considered as abandonment of the buildings. In law they continued to be in possession of the buildings. Hence the appellants' entry into the suit site was an unlawful act. In the eye of law they were trespassers. In demolishing the buildings put up by the respondents, they committed the offence of mischief. The fact that they had put up new structures cannot under the Transfer of Property Act, enhance their rights to the property. We have no material before us from which we can find out the value of the buildings demolished by them and the value of the building put up by them unlawfully. From the description of the building given in evidence, it appears that the newly put up building is only cattle shed. We are not satisfied that the newly put up building is worth more than the buildings that had been demolished by the appellants. In the circumstances of the case all that can be said is that the old buildings have been substituted by the new building. Therefore the owners of the old buildings continue to be the owners of the new building. In that view of the matter it is not necessary to consider whether if a stranger builds a building on the land of another, the true owner of the land is entitled to recover the land with the building on it. Equitable considerations persuade us to hold that when the respondents came back to their village in 1949, they were entitled to recover not only the site but also the building constructed on it by the appellants. Hence it should be held that on the date of vesting, the respondents were the owners of the building in question. In law they were holding the same.

The controversy between the parties in this appeal is as to the meaning to be attached to the word "held" in section 9 of the Act. Is the holding contemplated therein "lawful holding" or a mere holding lawful or otherwise. It is contended on behalf of the appellants that the dictionary meaning of the word "held" merely means "to have a possession of"; section 9 merely contemplates physical possession and nothing more; on the date of the vesting they were in physical possession of the site as well as the building; therefore the building must be deemed to have been settled with them. On the other hand it is contended on behalf of the respondents that the word "held" in section 9 of the Act means "lawfully held" and that section does not confer any benefit on a trespasser.

The meaning of the word "held" in section 9 came up for consideration before a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court consisting of Agarwala and Chaturvedi, JJ., in *Phekri Chamar and others v. Harish Chandra and others*¹. In that case the learned Judges held that the Legislature has deliberately used the word "held" and that word connotes the existence of a right or title in the holder. They further opined that section 9 does not confer a right on the persons having no title to the land. The settlement contemplated by the section is confined in its application to the case where the building is lawfully held by the person in possession. The learned Judges also observed that in enacting section 9, the Legislature never meant to deprive the citizens of their lawful rights over the lands merely because a trespasser has succeeded in making some construction on it. Section 9 does not mean that if a person has made some construction whatsoever over any land lying within the limits of an Estate, however wrongful or recent the possession might be, that construction must be deemed to have been settled with him by the State Government. The meaning of the word "held" in section 9 again came up before another Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court consisting of Desai and Takru, JJ. in *Bharat and another v. Ch. Khazan Singh and another*¹. The learned Judges declined to follow the decision in *Pheku Chamar's case*². They came to the conclusion that the Legislature used a wide language in section 9 and it covers the case of building belonging to persons who constructed them lawfully or unlawfully. It is unfortunate that the latter Division Bench should have thought it proper to sit in judgment over the correctness of a decision rendered by a Bench of co-ordinate jurisdiction. Judicial propriety requires that if a bench of a High Court is unable to agree with the decision already rendered by another co-ordinate bench of the same High Court, the question should be referred to a larger bench. Otherwise the decisions of High Courts will not only lose respect in the eyes of the public, it will also make the task of the subordinate Courts difficult.

The question of law referred to hereinbefore again arose for decision in this case. When this case came up in the second appeal before Sahai, J., he referred it to a Full Bench in view of the conflict of opinion noticed earlier. The Full Bench was presided over by Desai, C.J., who was a party to the decision in *Bharat's case*¹. The other members of the bench were Mukerji and Dwivedi, JJ. Mukerji and Dwivedi, JJ. agreed with the view taken in *Pheku Chamar's case*². Desai, C.J., in his dissenting judgment did not deal with the meaning of the word "held" in section 9 but on the other hand opined that the suit should have been dismissed because of the fact that the buildings put up by the respondents were not there on the date of vesting and hence the respondents were not entitled to the benefit of section 9.

Before considering the meaning of the word "held" in section 9, it is necessary to mention that it is proper to assume that the law makers who are the representatives of the people enact laws which the society considers as honest, fair and equitable. The object of every legislation is to advance public welfare. In other words as observed by Crawford in his book on statutory constructions that the entire legislative process is influenced by considerations of justice and reason. Justice and reason constitute the great general legislative intent in every piece of legislation. Consequently where the suggested construction operates harshly, ridiculously or in any other manner contrary to prevailing conceptions of justice and reason, in most instance, it would seem that the apparent or suggested meaning of the statute, was not the one intended by the law-makers. In the absence of some other indication that the harsh or ridiculous effect was actually intended by the Legislature, there is little reason to believe that it represents the legislative intent.

We are unable to persuade ourselves to believe that the legislature intended to ignore the rights of persons having legal title to possession and wanted to make a gift of any building to a trespasser howsoever recent the trespasser might have been if only he happened to be in physical possession of the building on the date of vesting. We are also unable to discern any legislative policy in support of that construction. It was urged before us by the learned Counsel for the appellants that the Legislature with a view to put a stop to any controversy as to any rights in or over any building directed that whoever was in physical possession of a building on the date of vesting shall be deemed to be the settlee of that building. He further urged that it would have been a hard and laborious task for the State to investigate into disputed questions relating to title or possession before making the settlement contemplated by section 9 and therefore the Legislature cut the Gordian Knot by conferring title on the person who was in possession of the building. We see no merit in this argument. The settlement contemplated by section 9 is a deemed settlement. That settlement took place immediately the vesting took place. No inquiry was contemplated before that settlement. If there is any dispute as to who is the settlee, the same has to be decided by the civil Courts. The State is not concerned with the same. Section 9 merely settles the building on the person who was holding it on the date of vesting.

It is true that according to the dictionary meaning the word "held" can mean either a lawful holding or even a holding without any semblance of a right such as holding by a trespasser. But the real question is as to what is the legislative intent? Did the Legislature intend to settle the concerned building with a person who was lawfully holding or with any person holding lawfully or otherwise? Mr. Misra contended that there is no justification for us to read into the section the word "lawfully" before the word "held". According to him, is the Legislature intended that the holding should be a lawful one, it would have said "lawfully held". He wanted us to interpret the section as it stands.

It is true that the Legislature could have used the word "lawfully held" in place of the word "held" in section 9 but as mentioned earlier one of the dictionary meaning given to the word "held" is "lawfully held". In Webster's New Twentieth Century Dictionary (Second Edition), it is stated that in legal parlance the word "held" means to possess by "legal title". In other words the word "held" is technically understood to mean to possess by legal title. Therefore by interpreting the word "held" as "lawfully held", we are not adding any word to the section. We are merely spelling out the meaning of that word. It may further be seen that the section speaks of all buildings. . . . with'n the limits of an Estate, belonging to or held by an intermediary or tenant or other person. . . The word "belonging" undoubtedly refers to legal title. The words "held by an intermediary" also refer to a possession by legal title. The words "held by tenant" also refer to holding by legal title. In the sequence mentioned above it is proper to construe the word "held" in section 9 when used in relation to the words "other person" as meaning "lawfully held" by that person. That interpretation flows from the context in which the word "held" has been used. We have earlier mentioned that the said interpretation accords with justice.

The expression "held" has been used in the Act in various other sections—see sections 2 (1), (c), 13, 17, 18, 21, 144, 204, 240-A, 298, 304 and 314 to connote possession by legal title. Mr. Misra, learned Counsel for the appellants does not deny that the expression "held" in those sections means held lawfully. But according to him that is because of the context in which the word is used. Mr. Misra is right in saying so but he overlooks the context in which that expression is used in section 9. We have already made reference to that context. He failed to point out to us any section in the Act, leaving aside section 9 for the time being where the word "held" has been used as meaning mere holding, lawful or otherwise. In *K. K. Handique v. The Member, Board of Agricultural Income-tax, Assam*¹ this Court was called upon to consider the meaning of the word "holds" in sections 12 and 13 of the Assam Agricultural Income-tax Act. Subba Rao, J., (as he then was) speaking for the Court observed that the expression "holds" includes a twofold idea of the actual possession of a thing and also of being invested with a legal title though sometimes it is used only to mean actual possession. After reading sections 12 and 13 together he observed that the word "holds" in these sections mean holding by legal title. In *Eramma v. Verrupanna and others*², this Court considered the meaning of the word "possessed" in section 14 (1) of the Hindu Succession Act which laid down that "any property possessed by a female Hindu whether acquired before or after the commencement of this Act shall be held by her as full owner thereof and not as a limited owner". It held that the property possessed by a female widow, as contemplated in the section, is clearly a property to which she has acquired some kind of title whether before or after the commencement of the Act. It is true that in arriving at that conclusion the Court took into consideration the language of the provision as a whole and also the explanation to the section. The scheme of the Act is to abolish all Estates and vest the concerned property in the State but at the same time certain rights were conferred on persons in possession of lands or building. It is reasonable to think that the persons who were within the contemplation of the Act are those who were in possession of lands or buildings on the basis of some legal title. Bearing in mind the purpose with which the legislation was enacted, the scheme of the Act and the language used in section 9, we are of opinion that the word 'held' in section 9 means 'lawfully held'. In other words we accept the correctness of the view taken by Mukerji and Dwivedi, JJ. For the reasons already mentioned we are unable to agree with Desai, C.J., that the fact that the appellants had demolished the buildings put up by the respondents and put up some other building in their place had conferred any rights on them under section 9.

In the result the appeal is dismissed with costs.

While it cannot be disputed that there are certain classes of cases where certificate have been treated as conclusive evidence, there were yet others though admissible without calling the functionaries that gave them were nonetheless only prima facie evidence. In cases where the certificates are not to be treated as conclusive evidence and they are only prima facie evidence, the party against whom they are produced has a right to challenge the subject-matter of the certificate. The statutes have also in some cases recognised this right, such as for instance in sub-section (2) of section 510 of the Criminal Procedure Code in respect of reports given under the hand of several experts named in sub-section (1) notwithstanding the fact that they may be used in evidence in enquiry, trial or other proceedings under the Code.

Where certificates are not made final and conclusive evidence of two facts stated therein, it will be open to the party against whom certificates which are declared to be sufficient evidence either to rebut the facts stated therein by his own or other evidence or to require the expert to be produced for cross-examination which prayer the Court is bound to consider on merits in granting or rejecting it. There is no presumption that the contents are true or correct though such a certificate is evidence without formal proof. In any case where there is evidence to the contrary the Court is bound to consider that evidence along with such a certificate with or without the evidence of the expert who gave it being called and come to its own conclusion. It is true that sub-section (2) of section 13 of the Act has given a right both to the accused as well as the complainant on payment of the prescribed fee to apply to the Court after the prosecution has been instituted to send part of the sample preserved as required under sub-clause (1) or sub-clause (iii) of clause (c) of sub-section (1) of section 11 to the Director of the central laboratory for a certificate, and the Court is bound to send it under its seal to the said Director who has to submit a report within one month from the date of the receipt. This certificate under sub-section (3) supersedes the Public Analysts' certificate and is conclusive and final under sub-section (5). But nothing contained in these sub-sections relating to certificate of the Director of the Central Food Laboratory in any way limits the right of the accused of section 257 of the Criminal Procedure Code to require the Public Analyst to be produced. The Court may reject the prayer for good and sufficient reasons such as for instance where it is made for the purpose of vexation or delay or for defeating the ends of justice.

He'd on facts, the application was made more to delay the disposal of the case.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order dated the 6th November, 1967 of the Delhi High Court in Criminal Revision No. 189 of 1967.

Hardev Singh, Advocate, for Appellant.

Bishan Narain, Senior Advocate, (B. P. Maheshwari, Advocate, with him), for Respondent No. 1.

Dr. L. M. Singhvi, Senior Advocate, (R.N. Sachthey, Advocate, with him), for Respondent No. 2.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Jaganmohan Reddy, J.—This appeal by certificate granted by the Delhi High Court under Article 134 (1) (c) of the Constitution is against its judgment which confirmed the conviction of the accused of an offence under section 9 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) and against the enhancement of the sentence of imprisonment from the one till the rising of the Court to six months R.I. which is the minimum prescribed under the Act together with a fine of Rs. 1,000 in default to undergo six months R.I.

The appellant is a sweetmeat seller. It is alleged that on 1st September, 1965, Shri B. S. Sethi, Food Inspector appointed by the Central Government under section 9 of the Act visited his shop and found that the appellant was selling coloured laddus. The Food Inspector purchased 1,500 grams of these laddus by way of a sample by paying him Rs. 9 as the price thereof. This sample was sub-divided into three parts and was put into three separate bottles as required under section 11 of the Act. One bottle was given to the accused, another was sent to the Public Analyst and the third was retained by the Food Inspector. The sample sent to the Public Analyst was analysed and a report was received from him on 10th September, 1965, to the effect that the laddus were adulterated with unpermitted colour. Thereupon a complaint was filed against the accused and he was convicted by the magistrate on 17th October, 1966, and sentenced to imprisonment till the rising of the Court and to pay a fine of Rs. 1,000 in default to undergo six months R.I. It would appear that the Municipal Corporation filed before the Sessions Judge a revision for the enhancement of the sentence because the accused having been found guilty under the provisions of section 7 read with section 16 of the Act should have been awarded the minimum sentence of six months and a fine of Rs. 1,000 but instead he was sentenced to imprisonment till the rising of the Court and a fine of Rs. 1,000 which was not in accordance with the mandatory provisions of section 16 of the Act. The Sessions Judge, after hearing the parties accepted the contention of the Municipality and referred the case to the High Court recommending that the accused having been found guilty under the provisions of section 16 of the Act should have been awarded a minimum sentence of six months and a fine of Rs. 1,000. Before the High Court several contentions were raised on behalf of the accused one of which was that as his request for summoning the Public Analyst for cross-examination had not been acceded to, he had been prejudiced, as such the entire proceedings against him were vitiated. The High Court however rejected this contention on the ground that section 510 of the Code of Criminal Procedure had no application in that it only dealt with Chemical Examiner or an Assistant Chemical Examiner and other experts mentioned therein. It was also observed that where the accused desired to challenge the report of the Public Analyst under the Act, he had to follow the procedure provided in section 13 (2) for sending the sample to the Director of Central Food Laboratory for his examination, because any report given by him will supersede the report of the Public Analyst and would be final and conclusive as to the facts stated therein. Before us also a similar contention was urged by the learned Advocate for the accused Shri Hardev Singh who had produced before us the application made on behalf of the accused under section 510 (2) for calling the Public Analyst which was summarily rejected on 28th August 1966. This contention urged before us has to be determined in the light of the relevant provisions of the Act.

It cannot be disputed that any person selling food with impermissible colouring matter contravenes the provisions of section 7 which prohibits the selling of any adulterated food and would be punishable under section 16 of the Act. What is adulterated article of food has been defined in section 2 (i) and so far as it is related to colouring sub-clause (j) of clause (i) of section 2 provides that an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated "if any colouring matter other than that prescribed in respect thereof and in amounts not within the prescribed limits of variability is present in the article". Rules 23 and 27 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Rules, 1955 prohibit the addition of any colouring matter except permitted by the Rules, and of inorganic colouring matters and pigments to any article of food. What is permitted and to what extent has been stated in rules 24 to 26 and 28 to 31, but in so far as this case is concerned we may merely refer to rules 26 and 28 the former of which gives a list of natural colouring matters that can be used and the latter with coal tar dyes. We are told that the laddus which were being sold by the accused had yellow colour. If so, item 2 of rule 28 prescribes that the only permitted colours are Tartrazine with colour index 640 belonging to Chemical class of Xanthene and Sunset Yellow FCF belonging to the chemical class Azo, and these alone can be used. It will therefore be incumbent on the Public Analyst to say whether the colour used is that which is permissible under any of the rules and if as in the report he has stated that the sample of the Laddus purchased by the Food Inspector was coloured with unpermitted colour, it would mean that the accused has not used any of the colours permitted under the rules. The report of the Public Analyst is as follows :—

"Butyro Refractometer reading at 40° C of the fact extracted from sweets—50.0 Baudouin test of the extracted fact—Positive Reichert value of the extracted fact—7.59 Colour—unpermitted.

"The same is adulterated due to 7.0 excess in Butyro Refractometer reading at 40° C of the fact extracted from sweets, 20.41 deficiency in Reichert value of the extracted fact Baudouin test of extracted fact being positive, and also coloured with unpermitted colour."

The learned Advocate or the accused submits that the refusal of the Court to grant the application of the accused to call the Public Analyst Shri Sudhama Rao for cross-examination has greatly prejudiced him, as such the conviction ought to be quashed. It is contended that the accused has a valuable right of cross-examination to test the contents of the report given by the Public Analyst and the Court has to summon him if so desired. On the other hand it is contended both by Shri Bishan Narain or the Delhi Municipality as well as Dr. Singhvi or the Union of India that no such right has been conferred under the Act when the provisions of section 13 (5) have not only made the document signed by the Public Analyst to be used in evidence of the facts stated therein in any proceedings under the Act or under section 272 to 276 of the Indian Penal Code but has given a right to the accused to have the sample sent to the Director of the Central Food Laboratories under section 13 (2) whose report supersedes that of the Public Analyst and is final and conclusive. In view of the provisions it is said that the Legislature inferentially took away the right of the accused to summon the Public Analyst either for examination or cross-examination, as such the analogy of section 510 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code which specifically gives a right to summon and examine the chemical examiner and other experts therein stated, as to the subject matter of their respective reports has no relevance. Dr. Singhvi further contends that there are a class of cases which permit of trials by certificates where the general rule of evidence that every document in order to be admissible has to be proved by the person signing it has no application as the statute permits it to be proved without calling the author of it. While it cannot be disputed that there are certain classes of cases where cerificates have been treated as conclusive evidence, there were yet others though admissible without calling the functionaries that gave them were nonetheless only prima facie evidence. In cases where the certificates are not to be treated as conclusive evidence and they are only prima facie evidence, the party against whom they are produced has a right to challenge the subject matter of the certificate. The statutes have also in some cases recognised this right, such as for instance in sub-section (2) of section 510 Criminal Procedure Code in respect of reports given under the hand of several experts named in sub-section (1) notwithstanding the fact that they may be used in evidence in enquiry, trial or other proceedings under the Code. Sub-section (2) provides: "The Court may if it thinks fit, and shall, on the application of the prosecution or the accused, summon and examine any such person as to the subject matter of the report". Similarly sub-section (1) of section 110 of the English Food and Drugs Act 1955 while providing that the production by one of the parties of the certificate of a Public Analyst in the form prescribed in section 92 (5) or of a document supplied to him by the other party as being a copy of such certificate shall be sufficient evidence of the facts stated therein unless in the first mentioned case the other party requires that the analyst shall be called as a witness. Sub-section (2) of section 110 also gives a like opportunity in the case of a certificate of an officer who took a sample of the milk. It appears to us that where certificates are not made final and conclusive evidence of the facts stated therein, it will be open to the party against whom certificates which are declared to be sufficient evidence either to rebut the facts stated therein by his own or other evidence or to require the expert to be produced for cross-examination which prayer the Court is bound to consider on merits in granting or rejecting it. There is no presumption that the contents are true or correct though such a certificate is evidence without formal proof. In any case where there is evidence to the contrary the Court is bound to consider that evidence along with such a certificate with or without the evidence of the expert who gave it being called and come to its own conclusion. It is true that sub-section (2) of section 13 of the Act has given a right both to the accused as well as the complainant on payment of the prescribed fee to apply to the Court after the prosecution has been instituted to send part of the sample preserved as required under sub-clause (1) or sub-clause (iii) of clause (c) of sub-section (1) of section 11 to the Director of the Central Laboratory for a certificate, and the Court is bound to send it under its seal to the said Director who has to submit a report within one month from the date of the receipt. This certificate under sub-section (3) supercedes the Public Analyst's certificate and is conclusive and final under sub-section (5). But nothing contained in these sub-sections relating to certificate of the Director of the Central Food Laboratory in any way limits the right of the accused under sections 257 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to require the Public Analyst to be produced. The Court may, as we said earlier, reject the prayer for good and sufficient reasons such as for instance where it is made for the purpose of vexation or delay or for defeating the ends of justice.

In *Mangaldas Raghavji v. State*¹, this Court held that where the accused had not done anything to call the Public Analyst the Court could legally act on the report of the Public Analyst. Mudholkar, J., speaking for the Court observed at page 900.

"It is true that the certificate of the Public Analyst is not made conclusive but this only means that the Court of fact is free to act on the certificate or not as it thinks fit."

Again at page 902 it was said:

"As regards the failure to examine the Public Analyst as a witness in the case no blame can be laid on the prosecution. The report of the Public Analyst was there and if either the Court or the appellant wanted him to be examined as a witness appropriate steps would have been taken. The prosecution cannot fail solely on the ground that the Public Analyst had not been called in the case."

In *Sukhmal Gupta v. The Corporation of Calcutta*¹ the Assistant Public Analyst who had analysed the sample was examined and was cross-examined by the defence. It was contended that the Public Analyst was not called. There does not appear to have been any attempt to have him called, nor was any prejudice shown. On the other hand, the accused could have availed of the valuable right given to him under section 13 (2) but he did not do so, nor did he put any question in cross-examination that the tea was liable to deterioration and could not be analysed by the Director of Central Food Laboratory. In these circumstances the evidence of the Assistant Public Analyst and the report of the Public Analyst was accepted in maintaining the conviction.

In this case we would have remanded it to give the accused an opportunity to examine the Public Analyst but it appears to us that even before us no attempt was made as to why the evidence was required and what is the specific point which needs to be elucidated. The accused knows what colour he added, he could have easily said that that colour was one of the permitted colours, but he did not say so in his examination under section 342 nor did he produce any evidence of those whom he employed as to the colour which was added. In our view, the application was made more to delay the disposal of the case otherwise he could have easily made an application under section 13 (a) as soon as a complaint was lodged against him on 19th January, 1966, which was within 3½ months from the purchase of the sample and the receipt of the report. There is nothing to show that either the Laddus or the colour would have deteriorated even if he had made his application under section 13 (2) when he made the application under section 510 (2) on 20th August, 1966.

In these circumstances, we do not consider this to be a fit case for interference. The appeal is accordingly dismissed.

Preventive Detention Act (IV of 1950), section 3 (2)—Power of detention under the Act—An exceptional power—Detention for maintenance of “public order”—When justified—“Law and Order” distinguished from “public order.”

The freedom of the individual is of utmost importance in any civilised society. It is a human right. Under our Constitution it is a guaranteed right. It can be deprived of only by due process of law. The power to detain is an exceptional power to be used under exceptional circumstances. It is wrong to consider then same, as the executive appears to have done the present case, that it is a convenient substitute for the ordinary process of law.

The three incidents mentioned in the grounds in the present case are stray incidents spread over a period of one year and four months. These incidents cannot be said to be inter-linked. They could not have prejudiced the maintenance of ‘public order’ nor can they be held to be subversive of ‘public order.’ They were at best, prejudicial to “Law and Order”, being mere breaches of law.

Disturbance of “public order” is to be distinguished from acts directed against individuals which do not disturb the society to the extent of causing a general disturbance of public tranquillity. It is the degree of disturbance and its effect upon the life of the community in a locality which determines whether the disturbance amounts only to a breach of 'Law and Order.'

Under Article 32 of the Constitution of India for a writ in the nature of habeas corpus.

G.S. Chatterjee, Advocate for Sukumar Basu, Advocate for Respondents.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by :

Hegde, J.—In this petition under Article 32 of the Constitution submitted from Jail, the petitioner seeks a writ of Habeas Corpus directing his release from detention. We have already directed the release of the petitioner on 15th December, 1969. Now we proceed to give our reasons in support of that order.

The petitioner was ordered to be detained by the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta under section 3 (2) of the Preventive Detention Act, (IV of 1950) by his order dated 15th July, 1969. It is stated in that order that the petitioner was ordered to be detained with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the maintenance of "public order." That order was confirmed by the State Government after the same was approved by the Advisory Board.

From the grounds served on the petitioner, it appears that his detention was ordered because of the three instances mentioned therein. It is said therein that on 28th February, 1968, between 9-50 P.M. and 10-30 P.M. the petitioner armed with a knife along with some others also armed, created disturbance on the Northern Avenue in the course of which he attacked the local people with knife as a result of which one Ajit Kumar Biswas sustained stab injuries. It is further alleged that during that incident, the petitioner and his associates hurled sodawater bottles and brickbats towards the local people endangering their lives and safety and thereby they created fear and frightfulness amongst the people of the locality and thus affected public peace and tranquillity of the locality.

The second incident mentioned therein is that on 29th October, 1968, at about 9-10 P.M. the petitioner being armed with bombs and accompanied by some others created disturbance on Raja Manindra Road, in the course of which he and his associates hurled bombs, used swords, iron rods and lathis against the local people endangering their lives and safety and thereby they created fear and frightfulness in the locality resulting in the disturbance of public peace and tranquillity of that locality.

The last incident mentioned is that on 28th June, 1969, at about 11-15 P.M., the petitioner and his associates armed with bombs created disturbance on Raja Manindra Road in the course of which they indiscriminately hurled bombs towards the local people endangering their lives and safety and thereby they affected public peace and tranquillity of that locality.

From the record it does not appear that the petitioner was prosecuted for any of the offences mentioned earlier. It is not known why he was not prosecuted. In the ordinary course, if there is truth in the allegations made, he should have been prosecuted and given an opportunity to defend himself. The allegations made against the petitioner do not amount to anything more than that he committed certain breaches of law.

The freedom of the individual is of utmost importance in any civilized society. It is a human right. Under our Constitution it is a guaranteed right. It can be deprived of only by due process of law. The power to detain is an exceptional power to be used under exceptional circumstances. It is wrong to consider the same as the executive appears to have done in the present case that it is a convenient substitute for the ordinary process of law. The detention of the petitioner under the circumstances of this case appears to be a gross misuse of the power conferred under the preventive Detention Act,

The three incidents mentioned in the grounds are stray incidents spread over a period of one year and four months. These incidents cannot be said to be inter-linked. They could not have prejudiced the maintenance of 'public order' nor can they be held to be subversive of 'public order'. They were at best prejudicial to "law and order." The distinction between the maintenance of 'public order' and maintenance of "law and order" was brought out by this Court in *Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia v. State of Bihar*¹. Therein this Court pointed out that maintenance of "law and order" is a conception much wider than the conception of maintenance 'public order.' The latter is the prevention of a disorder of grave nature. Every act that affects "law and order," need not affect 'public order.' If it is otherwise every one who disturbs "law and order", however petty the offence committed by him may be, can be detained under the Preventive Detention Act. This would be a total repudiation of the rule of law and an affront to our Constitution. The legal position relating to the point in issue was again recently considered by this Court in *Arun Ghosh v. State of West Bengal*². Therein it was observed that 'public order' is the even tempo of the life of the community taking the country as a whole or even a specified locality. Disturbance of public order is to be distinguished from acts directed against individuals which do not disturb the society to the extent of causing a general disturbance of public tranquillity. It is the degree of disturbance and its effect upon the life of the community in a locality which determines whether the disturbance amounts only to a breach of "law and order."

We are of the opinion that the grounds stated in support of the detention cannot amount to a disturbance of the maintenance of 'public order.'

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), sections 5, 14 and 105—Lease for 10 years—Option given to lessee to get the lease renewed after every ten years—Whether hit by rule of perpetuity.

It is well known that the rule against perpetuity is founded on the principle that the liberty of alienation "shall not be exercised to its own destruction and that all contrivances shall be void which tend to create a perpetuity or place property for ever out of the reach of the exercise of the power of alienation." A lease is not a mere contract but it is a transfer of an interest in land and creates a right in rem. Owing to the provisions of section 105 a lease in perpetuity can be created but even then an interest still remains in the lessor which is called a reversion.

Section 14 is applicable only where there is transfer of property.

Held, on facts, even if creation of a lease-hold interest is a transfer of right in property and would fall within the expression 'transfer of property' the transfer was for a period of ten years only by means of the indenture Exhibit P-1. The stipulation relating to renewal could not be regarded as transferring property or any rights therein. The clause containing the option to get the lease renewed on the expiry of each term of ten years can by no means be regarded as creating an interest in property of the nature that would fall within the ambit of section 14.

Held, further the expression "covenant runs with the land" has been taken from the English law of real property. It is an exception to the general rule that all covenants are personal. Even on the footing that the clauses relating to renewal in the lease contain covenants running with the land the rule against perpetuity contained in section 14 of the Act would not be applicable as no interest in property has been created of the nature contemplated by that provision.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and order dated the 20th December, 1967 of the Mysore High Court in regular Second Appeal No. 811 of 1965.

S. V. Gupte, Senior Advocate, (Janendra Lal, Advocate, B. R. Agarwala, Advocate of M/s. Gagrut & Co., and Kumar M. Mehta, Advocate, with him), for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Grover, J.—This is an appeal by Special Leave from a judgment of the Mysore High Court in which the question involved is whether an option given to a lessee to get the lease, which is initially for a period of 10 years, renewed after every 10 years is hit by the rule of perpetuity and is void.

The respondent entered into a deed of lease on 26th October, 1951, with the appellant in respect of premises Nos. 8 and 9, Mahatma Gandhi Road, (South Parade), Civil Station, Bangalore. It was stipulated that the lease would be for a period of 10 years in the first instance with effect from 1st November, 1961 "with an option to the lessee to renew the same as long as desired as provided." Clauses 9 and 10 which are material may be reproduced:—

"9. The lessee shall have the right to renew the lease of the scheduled premises at the end of the present period of ten years herein secured on the same rental of Rs. 450 per month, for a similar period and for further similar periods thereafter on the same terms and conditions as are set forth herein; and the Lessee shall be permitted and shall have the right to remain in occupation of the premises on the same terms and conditions for any further periods of ten years as long as they desire to do so.

10. The lessor shall not raise any objection whatsoever to the lessee exercising his option to renew the lease for any further periods of ten years on the same terms and conditions as long as they desire to be in occupation, provided that the lessee shall not have the right to transfer the lease or alienate any right thereunder."

It appears that before the expiry of the period of ten years from the date of the commencement of the lease the lessee wrote to the lessor informing him of the intention to exercise the option given to the lessee under the deed of lease to get the same renewed on the same terms and conditions as before for a period of ten years from 1st November, 1961. The lessor did not comply with the request. After serving a notice the lessee filed a suit for specific performance of the covenant in the lease for renewal. It was prayed that the lessor be directed to execute a registered deed of lease in favour of the lessee and if he failed to do so the Court should execute a deed in his favour. The lessor pleaded, inter alia, that the condition relating to renewal was hit by the rule against perpetuity. Certain other pleas were taken with which we are not concerned. The trial Court decreed the suit. The first appellate Court and the High Court affirmed the decree.

The rule against perpetuity is embodied in section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act, hereinafter called the Act. According to it no transfer of property can operate to create an interest which is to take effect after the lifetime of one or more persons living at the date of such transfer and the minority of some person who shall be in existence at the expiration of that period and to whom, if he attains full age, the interest created is to belong. It is well known that the rule against perpetuity is founded on the principle that the liberty of alienation "shall not be exercised to its own destruction and that all contrivances shall be void which tend to create a perpetuity or place property for ever out of the reach of the exercise of the power of alienation." The words "transfer of property" have been defined by section 5 of the Act to mean an act by which a living person conveys property in present or in future to one or more other living persons etc. The words "living persons" include a Company or association or body of individuals. Section 105 of the Act defines "lease." A lease of immovable property is a transfer of a right to enjoy such property made for a certain time express or implied or in perpetuity in consideration of a price paid or promised or of money, a share of crops, service or any other thing of value. A lease is not a mere contract but it is a transfer of an interest in land and creates a right in rem. Owing to the provisions of section 105 a lease in perpetuity can be created but even then an interest still remains in the lessor which is called a reversion.

It is not disputed on behalf of the appellant that a lease in perpetuity could have been created but the lease in the present case was not of that kind and was for a period of ten years only in the first instance. It is said that the mischief is created by the clauses relating to renewal which are covenants that run with the land. It is pointed out that on a correct construction of the renewal clauses the rule of perpetuity contained in section 14 would be immediately attracted. We are unable to agree. Section 14 is applicable only where there is transfer of property. Even if creation of a lease-hold interest is a transfer of a right in property and would fall within the expression "transfer of property" the transfer was for a period of ten years only by means of the indenture Exhibit P-1. The stipulation relating to renewal could not be regarded as transferring property or any rights therein.

In *Ganesh Sonar v. Purnendu Narayan Singha and others*¹, in the case of lease of land an option had been given to the lessor to determine the lease and take possession of the lease hold land under specified conditions. The question was whether such a covenant would fall within the rule laid down in the English case *Woodall v. Clifton*², in which it was held that a proviso in a lease giving an option to the lessor to purchase the fee simple of the land at a certain rate was invalid as infringing the rule against perpetuity. The Patna High Court distinguished the English decision quite rightly on the ground that after the coming into force of the Act a contract for the sale of immovable property did not itself create an interest in such property as was the case under the English law. According to the Patna decision the option given by the lessee to the lessor to resume the lease hold land was merely a personal covenant and was not a covenant which created an interest in land and so the rule against perpetuity contained in section 14 of the Act was not applicable. The same principle would govern the present case. The clauses containing the option to get the lease renewed on the expiry of each term of ten years can by no means be regarded as creating an interest in property of the nature that would fall within the ambit of section 14.

Even under the English law the Court would give effect to a covenant for perpetual renewal so long as the intention is clear and it will not be open to objection on the ground of perpetuity; See Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Edn. Vol. 23 page 627. In *Muller v. Trafford*³, it was held that the covenant in a lease for renewal was not strictly a covenant for renewal. But Farwell, J., proceeded to observe that a covenant to renew had been held for at least two centuries to be a covenant running with the land. If so, then no question of perpetuity would arise. It appears that in England whatever might have been the reason, the objection of perpetuity had never been taken to cases of covenants for renewal. The following observations of Farwell, J., which were quoted with approval by Lord Evershed, M. R. in *Weg Motors Ltd. v. Hales and others*⁴, are note-worthy:

"But now I will assume that this is a covenant for renewal running with the land; it is then in my opinion free from any taint of perpetuity because it is annexed to the land. See Rogers v. Hosegood.⁵

The equitable rule that the burden of a covenant runs with the land is to be found in section 40 of the Act. This section reads:

"40. Where for the more beneficial enjoyment of his own immovable property, a third person, has, independently of any interest in the immovable property of another or of any easement thereon, a right to restrain the enjoyment in a particular manner of the latter property, or where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract, and annexed to the ownership of immovable property, but not amounting to an interest therein or easement thereon.

such right or obligation may be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof or a gratuitous transferee of the property affected thereby, but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right or obligation nor against such property in his hands."

As pointed out in Mulla's Transfer of Property Act, 5th Edn., at page 194, section 40 expressly says that the right of the covenantee is not an interest in the land bound by the covenant nor an easement. It is not an interest because the Act does not recognise equitable estates and it cannot be said as Sir George Jessal said in *London & South Western Railway v. Gomm*¹, that if a covenant "binds the land it creates an equitable interest in the land." The expression "covenant runs with the land" has been taken from the English law of real property. It is an exception to the general rule that all covenants are personal. Even on the footing that the clauses relating to renewal in the lease, in the present case, contain covenants running with the land the rule against perpetuity contained in section 14 of the Act would not be applicable as no interest in property has been created of the nature contemplated by that provision.

For the above reasons the appeal fails and it is dismissed with costs.

Shri Gopal Swarup Pathak

... Respondent.

Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Act (XXXI of 1952), sections 4 and 18—Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Rules (1952), rule 4—Election of Vice-President—Nomination paper sent by post—Validity—Rejection of invalid nomination paper—Returning Officer if can reject as soon as it is received or should wait till date of scrutiny.

It will be noticed that rule 4 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Election Rules provides only one manner of presentation of nomination paper, i.e., delivery either in person by the candidate or by his proposer or seconder. Further it mentions the time within which it can be delivered, i.e., between the hours of eleven in the forenoon and three in the afternoon. If the nomination paper is not presented in person either by the candidate or by the proposer or the seconder it cannot be deemed to have been presented at all.

If a nomination paper is received by post it would be difficult to say that it has been presented and received before 3 o'clock on the last date appointed under clause (a) of section 4 (1) of the Act. Such a nomination paper could not be treated to have been received within the meaning of sub-rule (2) of rule 4 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Election Rules and the Returning Officer is entitled to reject it.

As soon as the Returning Officer finds that a nomination paper has not been duly presented and received he must reject it outright at the time it is handed over to him and it is not necessary for him to wait till the date of scrutiny.

The Rules contemplate only one method of presentation of nomination paper and if that method is not followed the nomination paper cannot be held to be validly presented and must be rejected outright. To hold otherwise would lead to utter confusion and delay in the completion of the election.

In the result, the challenge to the election of Sri G. S. Pathak to the office of the Vice-President of India, on the ground that the nomination paper of Dr. Ram Sharan Das, which was sent by post, was wrongly rejected, must fail.

Under Article 71 of the Constitution of India and section 14 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Election Act (Act XXXI of 1952).

Jagadish Swarup, Solicitor-General of India and Dr. L.M. Singhvi, Senior Advocate (S. P. Nayar, Advocate, with them), for the Election Commission of India and Attorney-General for India.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Sikri, J.—This is a petition under Article 71 of the Constitution and section 14 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Act (XXXI of 1952)—hereinafter referred to as the Act—praying for a declaration that the election of Shri Gopal Swarup Pathak, respondent, to the office of the Vice-President of India is void.

The main ground on which this declaration is sought is that the nomination paper of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Sakhuja was wrongly rejected by the Returning Officer on 6th August, 1969. The respondent apart from meeting this ground has raised a number of other issues including the issue whether the nomination paper of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Sakhuja was genuine, and if not, whether the petition is maintainable. The learned Counsel for the respondent strongly pressed on us that we should first try this issue suggested by him but as we have come to the conclusion that the petition must fail on the ground that the nomination paper of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Sakhuja was rightly rejected on 6th August, 1969, it is not necessary to consider the other issues that arise out of the pleadings of the parties.

The two issues suggested by the petitioner which we propose to discuss are:

1. Whether the nomination of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Sakhuja has been wrongly rejected on the ground that the nomination paper was not delivered in person;
2. Whether the Returning Officer had power to reject the nomination even before the date of scrutiny.

The relevant facts for determining these issues may now be set out. On 19th or 20th July, 1969, the office of the Vice-President of India fell vacant on the resignation of the then incumbent, Shri V. V. Giri. The Election Commission appointed Shri B. N. Banerjee, Secretary, Rajya Sabha, as returning officer for the election of the Vice-President of India. The Election Commission issued a notification under section 4 appointing 9th August, 1969, as the last date for filing nomination for election to the office of the Vice-President of India and 11th August, 1969, for scrutiny of nomination papers. A number of candidates filed nomination papers and on 11th August, 1969, the Returning Officer made a record of proceedings. The relevant part of the proceedings reads as follows:

"I held the scrutiny of nomination papers for the Vice-Presidential Election today, the 11th August, 1969, at 11 A.M. in my office (Room No. 29) in Parliament House, New Delhi, 24 nomination papers were delivered to me within the time and in the manner laid down in rule 4 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Election Rules, 1952. These nomination paper related to:—

1. Shri S. Nagappa—(One nomination paper).

2. Shri G S Pathak—(Seventeen nomination papers)
3. Shri Sivashanmugam—(Two nomination papers) (Jagannathan Pillai)
4. Smt. Manohara Nirmala Holkar—(One nomination paper).
5. Shri B. P. Mahaseth—(One nomination paper).
6. Shri Hari Vishnu Kamath—(Two nomination papers).

3. I gave the candidates and the others present all facilities for examining the nomination papers of all the candidates delivered to me. The nomination paper were examined by them. No objection was raised to any nomination papers by any candidate or his representative. I scrutinised all the nomination papers and I found that they satisfied the requirements of a valid nomination paper. I accordingly accepted all the nomination papers as valid and made endorsements on all the 24 nomination papers accepting them.

4. I also brought to the notice of those present that I had received some nomination papers, and some other papers purporting to be nomination papers, by post, and that I could not treat them as valid nomination papers as they were not delivered to me in accordance with sub-rule (1) of rule 4 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Election Rules, 1952, and that they also did not comply with the provisions of law in other respects. I further mentioned to those present that there were in addition three other papers which, though presented to me in person, did not comply with the requirements of the law as they were not accompanied by the certified extracts from the electoral roll and suffered from other defects. I had not given any serial number to any of these papers and had rejected all of them."

One of the nominations referred to in para. 4 of the proceedings was that of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Sakhuja. It appears that the nomination papers of Dr. Sakhuja, alleged to be complete in every respect, were not delivered in person either by Dr. Sakhuja or by the proposer or seconder in person to the Returning Officer but were received by him by post on 6th August, 1969. On that very day the Returning Officer did not treat the papers as valid as they were not delivered to him in accordance with sub-rule (1) of rule 4 of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential Elections Rules, 1952.

In order to discuss the issues mentioned above it is necessary to set out the relevant statutory provisions. Under section 4 of the Act the Election Commission by notification appoints for every election (a) the last date for making nominations, (b) the date for scrutiny of nominations, (c) the last date for the withdrawal of candidatures, and (d) the date on which poll shall, if necessary, be taken. Under section 5 any person may be nominated as a candidate for election to the office of Vice-President if he is qualified to be elected to that office under the Constitution. Sub-section (2) of section 5 prescribes that each candidate shall be nominated by a nomination paper completed in the prescribed form and subscribed by the candidate himself as assenting to the nomination and by two electors as proposer and seconder.

We may assume for the purpose of this case that the conditions laid down in section 5 (2) were complied with.

Section 6 deals with the withdrawal of candidature and provides that any candidate may withdraw his candidature by a notice in writing in the prescribed form subscribed by him and delivered before three O'clock in the afternoon on the date fixed under clause (c) of sub-section (1) of section 4, to the Returning Officer either by such candidate in person or by his proposer or seconder who has been authorised in this behalf in writing by such candidate.

The learned Counsel for the petitioner rightly conceded that if a candidate wants to withdraw his candidature the notice in writing must be delivered to the Returning Officer in person by such candidate or by his proposer or seconder who has been authorised. In other words no candidate can withdraw by sending a notice in writing by post.

Section 18 gives the grounds for declaring the election of a returned candidate to be void. One of the grounds is:

“If the Supreme Court is of opinion that the nomination of any candidate has been wrongly rejected or the nomination of the successful candidate or of any other candidate who has not withdrawn his candidature has been wrongly accepted, the Supreme Court shall declare the election of the returned candidate to be void.”

Section 21 gives powers to the Central Government to make rules and the two matters among others, on which rules can be made are:

“(d) the form and manner in which nominations may be made and the procedure to be followed in respect of the presentation of nomination papers;

(e) the scrutiny of nominations and, in particular, the manner in which such scrutiny shall be conducted and the conditions and circumstances under which any person may be present or may enter objections thereat.”

In pursuance of these powers rules were framed. Rule 4 deals with the presentation of nomination papers and is in the following terms:

“4. (i) On or before the date appointed under clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 4, each candidate shall, either in person or by this proposer or seconder, between the hours of eleven in the forenoon and three in the afternoon, deliver to the Returning Officer at the place specified in this behalf in the public notice a nomination paper completed in Form 2 in the case of a Presidential election, and in Form 3 in the case of a Vice-Presidential election, together with a certified copy of the entry relating to the candidate in the electoral roll for the Parliamentary constituency in which he is registered.

(2) Any nomination paper which is not received before three O'clock in the afternoon on the last date appointed under clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 4 or to which the certified copy referred to in sub-rule (1) of this rule is not attached shall be rejected.”

Rule 5 prescribes the procedure on receipt of nomination papers as follows:

“5. On the presentation of a nomination paper, the Returning Officer shall—

(a) sign thereon a certificate stating the date and time of presentation of the nomination paper and enter thereon its serial number;

(b) inform the person or persons presenting the nomination paper of the date, time and place fixed for the scrutiny of nominations; and

(c) cause to be affixed in some conspicuous place in his office a copy of the nomination paper as certified and numbered under clause (a) of this rule.”

Rule 6 provides for the scrutiny of nominations and is in the following terms:

“6. (1) The candidates, one proposer and one seconder of each candidate, and one other person duly authorised in writing by such candidate, shall be entitled to be present at the time of scrutiny of nominations; and the Returning Officer shall give them all reasonable facilities for examining the nomination papers of all candidates which have been delivered within the time and in the manner laid down in rule 4.

(2) The Returning Officer shall then examine the nomination papers and decide all objections which may be made to any of them.

(3) The Returning Officer may, either on such objection or on his own motion, and after such summary inquiry, if any, as he thinks necessary, reject a nomination paper on any of the following grounds, namely:—

(a) that the candidate is not eligible for election as President or Vice-President, as the case may be, under the Constitution; or

(b) that the proposer or seconder is not qualified to subscribe a nomination paper under sub-section (2) of section 5; or

(c) that the signature of the candidate, proposer or seconder is not genuine or has been obtained by fraud; or

(d) that the nomination paper has not been duly completed and the defect or irregularity is of a substantial character; or

(e) that the proposer or seconder has subscribed, whether as proposer or seconder, another nomination paper received earlier by the Returning Officer at the same election.

(4) The Returning Officer shall hold the scrutiny on the date appointed in this behalf under clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 4 and shall not allow any adjournment of the proceedings except when such proceedings are interrupted or obstructed by riot or open violence or by causes beyond his control;

Provided that, in case an objection is made, the candidate concerned shall, if he so requires, be allowed time to rebut it not later than the next day but one following the date fixed for scrutiny, and the Returning Officer shall record his decision on the date on which the proceedings have been adjourned.

(5) The Returning Officer shall endorse on each nomination paper his decision either accepting or rejecting it and if the nomination paper is rejected, he shall record in writing a brief statement of his reasons for rejecting it."

The question whether a candidate is entitled to send his nomination papers by post to the Returning Officer may now be considered. It will be noticed that rule 4 provides only one manner of presentation i.e., delivery either in person by the candidate or by his proposer or seconder. Further it mentions the time within which it can be delivered i.e., between the hours of eleven in the forenoon and three in the afternoon. It seems to us that if the nomination paper is not presented in person either by the candidate or by the proposer or the seconder it cannot be deemed to have been presented at all. There seems to be good reason for making this rule because otherwise not only the authenticity of the person sending the nomination paper will be in doubt but also the time of the delivery of the nomination paper would be in doubt.

Be that as it may, if the rule provides one method of presentation that method of presentation must be followed. That this is the only method of presentation of nomination papers is borne out by subsequent provisions. Sub-rule (2) of rule 4 provides that any nomination paper which is not received before 3 O'clock in the afternoon on the last date appointed under clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 4 shall be rejected. This shows that even if a nomination paper is presented personally but after 3 O'clock in the afternoon it has to be rejected. The rule proceeds on the basis that the presentation must have been either in person or by the proposer or the seconder. If a nomination paper is received by post it would be difficult to say that it has been presented and received before 3 O'clock on the last date appointed under clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 4.

Rule 5 also proceeds on the basis that the presentation of a nomination paper must be in person because it requires the Returning Officer to sign thereon a certificate stating the date and time of presentation of the nomination paper and inform the person or persons presenting the nomination paper of the date, time and place fixed for the scrutiny of nominations. It is clear that rule 5 contemplates only one method of presentation. This is again evident from rule 6 which directs the Returning Officer inter alia to give the candidates and other authorised persons present reasonable facilities for examining the nomination papers of all candidates which have been delivered within the time and in the manner laid down in rule 4. In other words, the nomination papers which have not been delivered within time and in the manner laid down in rule 4 have not to be shown for purposes of scrutiny.

The learned Counsel for the petitioner contends that sub-rule (2) of rule 4 gives two grounds of rejection, one that the nomination paper is not received before

3 O'clock in the afternoon of the last date appointed under clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 4, and the second that the certified copy referred to in sub-rule (1) of rule 4 is not attached. He further says that rule 6 gives five more grounds of rejection. He says that the ground on which the nomination paper of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Shakuja has been rejected is not covered by either sub-rule (2) of rule 4 or rule 6 and accordingly the nomination paper of Dr. Ram Sharan Dass Shakuja could not have been validly rejected.

It seems to us that this nomination paper could be rejected on the ground that it has not been presented in person and received before 3 O'clock in the afternoon on the last date appointed under clause (a) of sub-rule (1) of rule 4. Such a nomination paper could not be treated to have been received within the meaning of sub-rule (2) of rule 4 and the Returning Officer was entitled to reject it.

There is no force in the second submission that at any rate the Returning Officer should have waited till the date of the scrutiny because as soon as he finds that a nomination paper has not been duly presented and received he must reject it outright at the time it is handed over to him.

The learned Counsel contends that even if there has been a breach of rule 4 (1), the rule is not mandatory and the breach of it should not be deemed fatal. We are unable to agree with this submission. As we have mentioned before, the rules contemplate only one method of presentation and if that method is not followed the nomination papers cannot be held to be validly presented and must be rejected outright. To hold otherwise would lead to utter confusion and delay in the completion of the election. The Returning Officer would not know who and where to inform about the date of scrutiny, he would not be certain whether it is genuine and would have to take evidence as to whether it is a genuine nomination paper or a forged paper.

In the result the petition fails and is dismissed with costs. The petitioner will pay to the respondent Rs. 500 as total amount of costs.

Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Developments) Act (LXVII of 1957)—Second Proviso to section 1 (2) added by Bihar Land Reforms (Amendment) Act, 1964 (Bihar Act IV of 1965) and the second sub-rule of Rule 20 added by notification on 10th December, 1964 to Bihar Mineral Concession Rules (1964)—Validity of.

Entry 54 of the union list speaks both of Regulation of mines and minerals Developments and Entry 23 is subject to Entry 54. It is open to Parliament to declare that it is expedient in the public interest that the control should rest in Central Government. To what extent such a declaration can go is for Parliament to determine and this must be commensurate with public interest. Once this declaration is made and the extent laid down, the subject of legislation to the extent laid down becomes an exclusive subject for legislation by Parliament. Any legislation by the state after such declaration and trenching upon the field disclosed in the declaration must necessarily be unconstitutional because that field is abstracted from the legislative competence of the State Legislature. The only dispute can be to what extent the declaration by Parliament leaves any scope for legislation by the State Legislature. If the impugned legislation falls within the ambit of such scope it will be valid, if outside it, then it must be declared invalid.

The declaration is contained in section 2 of Act (LXVII of 1957) and speaks of the taking under the control of the Central Government the regulation of mines and development of minerals to the extent provided in the Act itself. One has thus to look outside Act (LXVII of 1957) to determine what is left within the competence of the State Legislature but has to work it out from the terms of the Act. Since the Bihar State Legislature amended the Land Reforms Act after the coming into force of Act (LXVII of 1957) the declaration in the latter Act would carve out a field to the extent provided in that Act and to that extent Entry 23 would stand cut-down. To sustain the amendment the State must show that the matter is not covered by the Central Act. The other side must, of course, show that the matter is already covered and there is no room for legislation.

The subject of legislation is covered in respect of minor minerals by the express words of section 15 (1). Parliament has undertaken to legislate and laid down that regulation of the grant of prospecting licenses and mining leases in respect of minor minerals and for purposes connected therewith must be by rules made by the State Government whether the rules are made or not the topic is covered by Parliamentary legislation and to that extent the powers of State Legislature are wanting. Therefore, there is no room for State legislation.

The abolition of the rights of intermediaries in the mines and vesting these rights as lessors in the State Government was a topic connected, with land and land tenures. But after the mining leases stood between the State Government and the lessees any attempt to regulate those mining leases will fall not in Entry 18 but in Entry 23 even though the regulation incidentally touches land. The pith and substance of the amendment to section 10 of the Land Reforms Act falls within Entry 23 although it incidentally touches land not vice versa. Therefore this amendment was subject to the overriding power of Parliament as declared in Act (LXVII of 1957) in section 15.

The Union consists of its three links, namely, Parliament, Union Government and the Union Judiciary. Here the control is being exercised by Parliament, the legislative organ of the Union and that is also controlled by the Union. By giving the power to the State Government to make rules, the control of Union is not negated. In fact, it establishes that the Union is exercising the control. By enacting section 15 of Act (LXVII 1957) the union has taken all the powers to itself and authorised the State Government to make rules for regulation of leases. By the declaration and the enactment of section 15 the whole of the field relating to minor minerals came within the jurisdiction of Parliament and no scope was left for the enactment of the second proviso to section 10 in the Land Reforms Act.

Vested rights cannot be taken away except under authority of law and mere rule making power without the support of a legislative enactment is not capable of achieving such an end. The whole of the topic of minor minerals became a union subject. The Union Parliament allowed rules to be made but that did not recreate a scope for legislation at the state level.

Therefore, if the old leases were to be modified a legislative enactment by Parliament on the lines of section 16 of Act (LXVII 1957) was necessary. The place of such a law could not be taken by legislation by the State Legislature as it purported to do by enacting the second proviso to section 10 of the Land Reforms Act. Although section 16 applies to minor minerals it only permits modifications of mining leases granted before 25th October, 1949. In regard to leases of minor minerals executed between this date and December, 1964 where rule 20 (1) was enacted, there is no provision of law which enables the terms of existing leases to be altered. A mere rule is not sufficient. As no such Parliamentary law had been passed the second sub-rule to rule 20 was in effect. It could not derive substance from the second proviso to section 10 (2) of the Land Reforms Act since that proviso was not validly enacted.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Hidayatullah, C.J.—This judgment will also govern the disposal of Civil Appeals 686 (Kanti Prasad Pandey v. State of Bihar and others), 687 (Shri Krishna Chandra Gangopadhyay v. State of Bihar and others) and 688 (M/s. Pakur Quarries Private Ltd. and another v. State of Bihar and others) of 1967. These four appeals have been brought against a common judgment, 1st November, 1966, of the High Court of Patna and arise out of four petitions under Article 226 of the Constitution filed to question the validity of proviso (2) to section 10 (2) added by Bihar Land Reforms (Amendment) Act, 1964 (Bihar Act IV of 1955) and the operation of the second sub-rule of rule 20 added on 10th December, 1964, by a notification of the Governor in the Bihar Minor Mineral Concession Rules, 1964. The facts of all the four cases are similar and the same points arise for determination. It is, therefore, sufficient to state the facts in Civil Appeals 685 and 686 as illustrative of the others as well.

One Jyoti Prakash Panday obtained on 23rd March, 1955, from Babu Bijan Kumar Panday and Smt. Anila Devi acting for herself and also as legatee under the will of one Baidyanath Pandey, registered leases to quarry stone ballast, boulders and chips from and upon Blocks Nos. 32, 45/1, 45/2 and 45/3 in tauzi No. 1452 khata No. 1 in Mouza Malpahari No. 89 in Pakur Sub Division of Santal Parganas. The leases were to commence from 1st November, 1954, and to end on 31st October, 1984; that is to say, they were for a total period of 30 years. Jyoti Prakash Pandey was working under the name and style of 'stone India'. He sold his rights, title and interest by a registered sale-deed on 9th September, 1963 to the present appellant. It is admitted that rent under the terms of the original lease was deposited upto September, 1965.

On the passing of the Bihar Land Reforms Act (XXX of 1950) the ex-landlords ceased to have any interest from the date of vesting and in their place the State of Bihar became lessor under section 10 (1) of the Land Reforms Act. The terms of section 10 were as given below¹. After the vesting of the estate of

1. "10. Subsisting leases of mines and minerals.

—(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, where immediately before the date of vesting of the estate or tenure there is a subsisting lease of mines or minerals comprised in the estate or tenure or any part thereof, the whole or that part of the estate or tenure, comprised in such lease shall, with effect from the date of vesting, be deemed to have been leased by the State Government to the holder of the said subsisting lease for the remainder of the term of that lease, and such holder shall be entitled to retain possession of the lease-hold property.

(2) The term and conditions of the said lease by the State Government shall mutatis mutandis be the same as the terms and conditions of the subsisting condition that, if in the opinion of the State Government the holder of the lease had not before the date of the commencement of this Act, done any prospecting or development work, the State Government shall be entitled at any time before the expiry of one year from the said date to determine the lease by giving three months' notice in writing :

the intermediaries, the State of Bihar as the new lessor recognised the lease for the quarrying of stones for the remaining period and the Deputy Commissioner, Santhal Parganas asked for the rent from the date of vesting to 30th April, 1965, at the rate of Rs. 200 per year as stated in the original lease. This was by a letter issued from his office on 2nd February, 1963. On 10th December, 1964, the appellants received a letter which gives the gist of the facts on which the present controversy starts and the relevant part may be quoted here :

- “ Government have been pleased to amend the section 10 of Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950, and according to which the terms and conditions in regard to leases for minor minerals stand statutorily substituted by the corresponding terms and conditions by the Bihar Minor Mineral Concession Rules, 1964. As a result of this, rent and royalty, etc. in respect of minor minerals in the State irrespective of the date on which the lease was granted are to be paid by all categories of leases according to the rates given in the aforesaid Rules with effect from 27th October, 1964.”

The appellants denied their liability to pay. The Government informed them by letter as follows :

“ This is to inform you that the terms and conditions of your mining lease in so far as they are inconsistent with the Bihar Minor Mineral Concession Rules, 1964, framed by the State Government under section 15 of the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, 1957, stand substituted by the corresponding terms and conditions prescribed by the Bihar Mineral Concession Rules, 1964, from 27th January, 1964. Accordingly, dead rent, royalty and surface rent in addition to the other substitution as per Bihar Mineral Concession Rules, 1964, will be as follows :—

1. Dead rent .. Rs. 50 per acre per annum.
2. Royalty @ Rs. 3 per 100 cwt. of stone chips.
 @ Rs. 2 per 100 cft. of stone ballast and boulders.
 @ Rs. 4 per 100 cft. on building stones.
 @ Rs. 1 per 100 Nos. of stones “setts”.
3. Surface rent @ Rs. 10 per acre per year.”

It is this additional demand and the liability to pay, which is the subject of controversy here. The Bihar Government contends that the terms of the original lease have been validly altered by the operation of the second proviso to section 10 (2) of the Bihar Land Reforms Act added first by Ordinance III of 1964 and later incorporated again by the Bihar Land Reforms (Amendment) Act, 1964 (IV of 1965) and the addition of section 10-A to the Act by the same enactments. The material part of the second section of Act (IV of 1965) is quoted below¹. Section 10-A provided for the vesting of the interest of leases of mines or minerals which were subject to such leases and need not be read here. The State Government also Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall be deemed to prevent any modifications being made in the terms and conditions of the said lease in accordance with the provisions of any Central Act for the time being in force regulating the modification of existing mining leases.

(3) The holder of any such lease of mines and minerals as is referred to in sub-section (1) shall not be entitled to claim any damages from the outgoing proprietor or tenure-holder on the ground that the terms of the lease executed by such proprietor or tenure-holder in respect of the said mines and minerals have become incapable of fulfilment by the operation of this Act.

1. Amendment of section 10 of Bihar Act (XXX of 1950)—In section 10 of the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950 (Bihar Act XXX of 1950) (hereinafter referred to as the said Act),—

(a) in sub-section (2), the following second proviso shall be added, namely :—

“ Provided further that the terms and conditions of the said lease in regard to minor minerals as defined in the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, (LXVII of 1957), shall, in so far as they are inconsistent with the rules made by the State Government under section 15 of that Act, stand substituted by the corresponding terms and conditions prescribed by those rules and if further ascertainment and settlement of the terms will become necessary then necessary proceedings for that purpose shall be undertaken by the Collector”; and relied upon the Bihar Mineral Concession (First Amendment) Rules, 1964 by which a second sub-rule was added to rule 20. The twentieth rule, purporting to be framed under section 15 of the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, (LXVII of 1957) was amended on 19th December, 1964, and now reads:

(b) after sub-section “

Rule 20.—(1) Dead rent, royalty and surface rent.—When a lease is granted or renewed,

(a) Dead rent shall be charged at the rates specified in Schedule I.

(b) royalty shall be charged at the rates specified in Schedule II, and

(c) surface rent shall be charged at the rates specified by the Government in the Revenue Department from time to time.

(2) On and from the date of commencement of these rules, the provisions of sub-rule (1) shall also apply to leases granted or renewed prior to the date of such commencement and subsisting on such date."

The contention is that the amendment of section 10 of the Bihar Land Reforms Act is ultra vires the Constitution and that rule 20 (2) does not legally entitle the recovery of the dead-rent, royalty, etc., as in the Schedules to the Bihar Minor Mineral Concession Rules, 1964.

To understand fully the argument on behalf of the appellants a resume of the legislation on the subject of mines and minerals is necessary. Under the Government of India Act, 1935, the subject of Mines and Minerals was covered by Entry 36 of the Federal Legislative List I and Entry 23 of the Provincial Legislative List II of the 7th Schedule. These entries read as follows :

"Entry 36.—Regulation of mines and oil fields and mineral development to which such regulation and development under a Federal control is declared by Federal law to be expedient in the public interest."

"Entry 23.—Regulation of mines and oil fields and mineral development subject to the provisions of List I with respect to regulation and development under Federal control."

When the Indian Independence Act, 1947 was passed the word 'federal' where it occurs for the first time in Entry 36 and in Entry 23 was changed to 'dominion'. The entries are practically repeated in the present Constitution and may be read immediately here :

Entry 54 of List I—Union List—reads :

"Regulation of mines and mineral development to the extent to which such regulation and development under the control of the Union is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest."

Entry 23 of List II—State List—reads :

"Regulation of mines and mineral development subject to the provisions of List I with respect to regulation and development under the control of the Union."

The difference between the entries of the Government of India Act, 1935 and the present Constitution lies in the removal of oil fields from the entries and the declaration now must be by Parliament. Entry 53 in List I deals with oilfields and mineral resources.

In 1948 the Legislative Assembly enacted the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, (LIII of 1948). It received the assent of the Governor-General on 8th September, 1948. It was an Act to provide for the regulation of mines and oilfields and for the development of minerals. In section 2 of that Act is to be found the declaration contemplated by Entries 36 and 23, 7th Schedule of the Government of India Act, 1935. That declaration reads as follows :

"2. It is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that the Central Government should take under its control the regulation of mines and oilfields and the development of minerals to the extent hereinafter provided."

Section 3 of the Act of 1948 contained definitions. There were definitions of 'mine' and 'minerals'. The former meant an excavation for the purpose of searching for or obtaining minerals and included an oil-well and the latter included natural gas and petroleum. Section 4 provided that no mining lease would be granted after the commencement of that Act otherwise than in accordance with the rules made under that Act and that a mining lease granted contrary to the provisions would be void and of no effect. Section 5 empowered the Central Government, by notification to make rules for regulating the grant of mining leases or for prohibiting the grant of such leases in respect of any mineral or in any area. In particular the rules could provide for the manner in which, the minerals or areas in respect of which and the persons by whom, applications for mining leases could be made and the fees payable, the terms on which and the conditions subject to which, mining leases might be granted, the areas and the period for which any mining lease might be granted and the maximum and minimum rent payable by a lessee, whether the mine was worked or not. Under section 6 the Central Government had power to make rules as respect mineral development. Section 7 then provided as follows :

"7. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, may rules for the purpose of modifying or altering the terms and conditions of any mining lease granted prior to the commencement of this Act so as to bring such lease into conformity with the rules made under section 5 and 6 :

Provided that any rules so made which provide for the matters mentioned in clause (c) of sub-section (2) shall not come into force until they have been approved, either with or without modifications, by the Central Legislature.

(2) The rules made under sub-section (1) shall provide—

(a) for giving previous notice of the modification or alteration proposed to be made thereunder to the lessee, and when the lessor is not the Central Government, also to the lessor and for affording them an opportunity of showing cause against the proposal ;

(b) for the payment of compensation by the party who would be benefitted by the proposed modification or alteration to the party whose rights under the existing lease would thereby be adversely affected ; and

Section 8 provided that the Central Government might by notification direct that any power exercisable under that Act might be exercised, subject to such conditions if any, as might be specified by such officer or authority or might be specified in the direction. In furtherance of the powers conferred the Central Government framed the Mineral Concession Rules, 1949 and they came into force on the twenty-fifth day of October, 1949. These rules for the first time defined minor minerals and after amendments from time to time the term meant :

"3 (ii) "minor mineral" means building stone, boulder, shingle, gravel, Chalcedony pebbles (used for ball mill purposes only), limeshell, kankar and limestone used for lime burning, murrum, brick-earth (Fuller's earth), Bentonite, ordinary clay, ordinary sand (used for non-industrial purposes), road metal, reh-matti, slate and shale when used for building material."

Rule 4 however provided :

"4. Exemption—These rules shall not apply to minor minerals, the extraction of which shall be regulated by such rules as the Provincial Government may prescribe."

The word "provincial" was later changed to 'State'. Although some of the Provinces (now States) made Minor Mineral Concession Rules, it is admitted that Bihar Government did not frame any such rules.

The leases of the appellants' predecessors were granted in 1955 during the subsistence of the Act of 1948 and the Rules of 1949. It is also to be noticed that a fresh declaration was made by Parliament as required by Entry 54, List I—Union List of the 7th Schedule of the Constitution. The existing laws, however, continued. Without a declaration by Parliament the field of legislation might have been open to the State Legislatures under Entry 23 of List II—State List of the Constitution but no law was made except what was enacted by the Bihar Legislature in the Land Reforms Act about vesting of mines in the State and the emergence of the State as a lessor in place of all original lessors.

Further rules were made by the Central Government in 1955 and 1956. In 1955 Minerals Conservation and Development Rules were made which were later replaced in 1958. On 4th September, 1956, the Central Government in exercise of the powers conferred by section 7 of the Act of 1948 made the Mining Leases (Modification of Terms) Rules, 1956. Under these rules existing mining leases were to be brought into conformity with the Minerals Conservation and Development Rules. The expression 'existing mining leases' was defined as a mining lease granted before the 25th day of October, 1949 and subsisting at the commencement of those rules but did not include any lease in respect of any minor mineral within the meaning of clause (c) of section 3 of the Act of 1948.

We now come to the year 1957. In that year Parliament enacted the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act (LXVII of 1957). It came into force from 28th December, 1957, Act (LXVII of 1957) made amendments in the Act of 1948 so as to make the latter relate to oilfields only. All references to minerals other than oil were removed, with the result that it became legislation exclusively relating to oil and gas. Since the Act of 1948 was thus altered, Parliament enacted new provisions for minerals in Act (LXVII of 1957). We are primarily concerned with this Act in these appeals. A glance at some of the provisions of Act (LXVII of 1957) is necessary.

The Act (LXVII of 1957) came into force on 1st June, 1958, and extended to the whole of India. It contained the following declaration in section 2 :

"It is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that the Union should take under the control the regulation of mines and the development of 'minerals to the extent hereinafter provided."

By definition minerals excluded mineral oils because the Act of 1948 exclusively dealt with oil. 'Minor minerals' were defined to mean building stones, gravel, ordinary clay, ordinary sand other than sand used for prescribed purposes and any other mineral which the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, declare to be a minor mineral. Act (LXVII of 1957) contained 33 sections which were separated by general headings showing the topics dealt with. The first group of sections 4—9 contained general restrictions on undertaking prospecting and mining operations. Of this group we may quote here section 4 which will be considered later :

"4. Prospecting or mining operations to be under licence or lease—

(1) No person shall undertake any prospecting or mining operations in any area, except under and in accordance with the terms and conditions of a prospecting licence or, as the case may be, a mining lease, granted under this Act and the rules made thereunder :

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall affect any prospecting or mining operations undertaken in any area in accordance with the terms and conditions of a prospecting licence or mining lease granted before the commencement of this Act which is in force at such commencement.

(2) No prospecting licence or mining lease shall be granted otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder."

Section 5 lays down restrictions on the grant of prospecting licences or mining leases. Section 6 prescribes the maximum area for which a prospecting licence or mining lease may be granted and section 7 the periods for which prospecting licences may be granted or renewed and section 8 the periods for which mining leases may be granted or renewed. Section 9 fixes the royalties in respect of mining leases.

Then follows another group of sections 10—12 which lays down the procedure for obtaining prospecting licences or mining leases in respect of land in which the minerals vest in the Government. The next group of section 13—16 is headed Rules for regulating the grant of prospecting licences and mining leases. Section 13 gives power to the Central Government to make rules in respect of minerals. Section 14 however excludes the application of sections 4-13 to minor minerals. It reads :

“The provisions of sections 4 to 13 (inclusive) shall not apply to prospecting licences and mining leases in respect of minor minerals.”

Section 15 gives power to the State Governments to make rules in respect of minor minerals. It reads :

“15 (1). The State Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette make rules for regulating the grant of prospecting licences and mining leases in respect of minor minerals and for purposes connected therewith.

(2) Until rules are made under sub-section (1), any rules made by a State Government regulating the grant of prospecting licences and mining leases in respect of minor minerals which are in force immediately before the commencement of this Act shall continue in force.”

Section 16 gives power to modify mining leases granted before 25th October, 1949. It reads :

“16 (1). All mining leases granted before the 25th day of October, 1949, shall, as soon as may be after the commencement of this Act, be brought into conformity with the provisions of this Act and the rules made under section 13 and 18 :

Provided that if the Central Government is of opinion that in the interests of minerals development it is expedient so to do, it may, for reasons to be recorded permit any person to hold one or more such mining leases covering in any one State a total area in excess of that specified in clause (b) of section 6 or for a period exceeding that specified in sub-section (1) of section 8.

(2) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, make rules for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of sub-section (1) and in particular such rules shall provide—

(a) for giving previous notice of the modification or alteration proposed to be made in any existing mining lease to the lessee and where the lessor is not the Central Government also to the lessor and for affording him an opportunity of showing cause against the proposal ;

(b) for the payment of compensation to the lessee in respect of the reduction of any area covered by the existing mining lease ; and

Section 17 stands by itself as a group and contains special powers of Central Government to undertake prospecting or mining operations in certain cases. Section 18 deals with mineral development and gives additional rule making power to the Central Government. Next follow some miscellaneous provisions ; of these, only two interest us. Section 19 lays down that prospecting licences or mining leases granted, renewed or acquired in contravention of the provisions of the Act shall be void and of no effect and section 20 that the provisions apply to prospecting licences or mining leases whether granted before or after the Act. The rest of this Act does not concern this dispute.

It may be pointed out here that the rules made under section 13 do not apply to minor minerals in view of the provisions of section 14. The State of Bihar had not made any rule till the Bihar Minor Minerals Concession Rules, 1964 were made.

The modification of the terms of existing mining leases was provided for in section 16 but that provisions applied to mining leases granted before 25th October, 1949. The provisions of Mining Leases (Modification of Terms) Rules 1955 did not apply to minor minerals because the definition of 'existing mining lease' excluded a lease in respect of any minor minerals. The power to modify the existing leases in the case had to be found elsewhere.

The argument of the appellants is that apart from the provisions of the 2nd proviso to section 10 added to the Land Reforms Act 1950 in 1964 by Act (IV of 1965) and second sub-rule added to rule 20 of the Bihar Minor Mineral Concession Rules, 1964, there is no power to modify the terms. These provisions of law are said to be outside the competence of the State Legislature and the Bihar Government. With regard to the State Legislature it is contended that the scheme of the relevant entries in the Union and State List is that to the extent to which regulation of mines and mineral development is declared by Parliament by law to be expedient in the public interest, the subject of legislation is withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the State Legislature and therefore Act (LXVII of 1957) leaves no legislative field to the Bihar Legislature to enact Act (IV of 1965) amending the Land Reforms Act. As regards rule 20 (2) it is contended that the rule making power of its own force cannot reach mining leases granted in 1955 and that this could only be done by a competent Legislature. These are the two matters which need decision.

The main arguments are supplemented by the following contentions. That the Bihar Rules in so far as they make demands of rent and royalty on the existing leases which were executed prior to their coming into force are beyond the power to make rules in respect of minor minerals under section 15 of Act (LXVII of 1957), that section 15 itself is unconstitutional and void because it delegates legislative power to the rule-making authority and it is excessive delegation and that the amendment of Bihar Land Reforms Act is void because it affects the fundamental rights of the appellants guaranteed under Articles 31 and 19 of the Constitution.

Although these supplementary arguments were raised it is obvious that they can arise according as the two main arguments are allowed or disallowed. Therefore it is necessary to address ourselves to the first argument that the legislative competence to enact the amendment to section 10 of the Reforms Act was wanting. As the amendment was made after Act (LXVII of 1957) we have to consider the position in relation to it. Entry 54 of the Union List speaks both of Regulation of mines and minerals Development and entry 23 is subject to entry 54. It is open to Parliament to declare that it is expedient in the public interest that the control should rest in Central Government. To what extent such a declaration can go is for Parliament to determine and this must be commensurate with public interest. Once this declaration is made and the extent laid down, the subject of legislation to the extent laid down becomes an exclusive subject for legislation by Parliament. Any legislation by the State after such declaration and trenching upon the field disclosed in the declaration must necessarily be unconstitutional because that field is abstracted from the legislative competence of the State Legislature. This proposition is also self-evident that no attempt was rightly made to contradict it. There are also two decisions of this Court reported in the *Hirgir-Rampur Coal Co., Ltd. and others v. State of Orissa and others*¹ and State of Orissa v. M.A. Tulloch & Co.,² in which the matter is discussed. The only dispute, therefore, can be to what extent the declaration by Parliament leaves any scope for legislation by the State Legislature. If the impugned legislation falls within the ambit of such scope it will be valid; if outside it, then it must be declared invalid.

The declaration is contained in section 2 of Act (LXVII of 1957) and speaks of the taking under the control of the Central Government the regulation of mines and development of minerals to the extent provided in the Act itself. We have thus not to look outside Act (LXVII of 1957) to determine what is left within the competence of the State Legislature but have to work it out from the terms of that Act. In this connection we may notice what was decided in the two cases of this Court. In the

1. (1951) 2 S.C.R. 537.

2. (1954) 4 S.C.R. 461.

*Hingir-Rampur case*¹, a question had arisen whether the Act of 1948 so completely covered the field of conservation and development of minerals as to leave no room for State legislation. It was held that the declaration was effective even if the rules contemplated under the Act of 1948 had not been made. However, considering further whether a declaration made by a Dominion Law could be regarded as a declaration by Parliament for the purpose of Entry 54, it was held that it could not and there was thus a lacuna which the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950 could not remove. Therefore, it was held that there was room for legislation by the State Legislature.

In the *M.A. Tulloch case*², the firm was working a mining lease granted under the Act of 1948. The State Legislature of Orissa then passed the Orissa Mining Areas Development Fund Act, 1952, and levied a fee for the development of mining areas within the State. After the provisions came into force a demand was made for payment of fees due from July, 1957 to March, 1958 and the demand was challenged. The High Court held that after the coming into force of Act (LXVII of 1957) the Orissa Act must be held to be non-existent. It was held on appeal that since Act (LXVII of 1957) contained the requisite declaration by Parliament under Entry 54 and that Act covered the same field as the Act of 1948 in regard to mines and mineral development, the ruling in *Hingir-Rampur case*¹, applied and as sections 18 (1) and (2) of the Act (LXVII of 1957) were very wide they ruled out legislation by the State Legislature. Where a superior Legislature evinced an intention to cover the whole field, the enactments of the other Legislature whether passed before or after must be held to be overborne. It was laid down that inconsistency could be proved not by a detailed comparison of the provisions of the conflicting Acts but by the mere existence of two pieces of legislation. As section 18 (1) covered the entire field, there was no scope for the argument that till rules were framed under that section, room was available.

These two cases bind us and apply here. Since the Bihar State Legislature amended the Land Reforms Act after the coming into force of Act (LXVII of 1957), the declaration in the latter Act would carve out a field to the extent provided in that Act and to that extent entry 23 would stand cut down. To sustain the amendment the State must show that the matter is not covered by the Central Act. The other side must, of course, show that the matter is already covered and there is no room for legislation.

We have already analysed Act (LXVII of 1957). The Act takes over the control of regulation of mines and development of minerals to the Union of course, to the extent provided. It deals with minor minerals separately from the other minerals. In respect of minor minerals it provides in section 14 that sections 4—13 of the Act do not apply to prospecting licences and mining leases. It goes on to state in section 15 that the State Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, make rules for regulating the grant of prospecting licences and mining leases in respect of minor minerals and for purposes connected therewith, and that until rules are made, any rules made by the State Government regulating the grant of prospecting licences and mining leases in respect of minor minerals which were in force immediately before the commencement of the Act would continue in force. It is admitted that no such rules were made by the State Government. It follows that the subject of legislation is covered in respect of minor minerals by the express words of section 15 (1). Parliament has undertaken legislation and laid down that regulation of the grant of prospecting licences and mining leases in respect of minor minerals and for purposes connected therewith must be by rules made by the State Government. Whether the rules are made or not the topic is covered by Parliamentary legislation and to that extent the powers of State Legislature are wanting. Therefore, there is no room for State legislation.

Mr. Lal Narain Sinha argued that the topic of legislation concerns land and therefore falls under Entry 18 of the State List and he drew our attention to other provisions on the subject of mines in the Land Reforms Act as originally passed. The abolition of the rights of intermediaries in the mines and vesting these rights as lessors in the State Government was a topic connected with land and land tenures. But after the mining leases stood between the State Government and the lessees, any attempt to regulate those mining leases will fall not in Entry 18 but in Entry 23 even though the regulation incidentally touches land. The pith and substance of the amendment to section 10 of the Reforms Act falls with in Entry 23 although it incidentally touches land not vice versa. Therefore this amendment was subject to the overriding power of Parliament as declared in Act (LXVII of 1957) in section 15. Entry 18 of the State list, therefore, is no help.

1. (1961) 2 S.C.R. 537.

2. (1964) 4 S.C.R. 461.

Mr. Lal Narain Sinha next contended that the provisions of sections 4-14 do not envisage control of the Union which is a condition precedent to the ousting of the jurisdiction under Entry 23. Obviously Mr. Lal Narain Sinha reads Union as equivalent to Union Government. This is erroneous. Union consists of its three limbs, namely, Parliament, Union Government and the Union Judiciary. Here the control is being exercised by Parliament, the legislative organ of the Union and that is also controlled by the Union. By giving the power to the State Government to make rules, the control of Union is not negatived. In fact, it establishes that the Union is exercising the control. In view of the two rulings of this Court referred to earlier we must hold that by enacting section 15 of Act (LXVII of 1957) the Union has taken all the power to itself and authorised the State Government to make rules for the regulation of leases. By the declaration and the enactment of section 15 the whole of the field relating to minor minerals came within the jurisdiction of Parliament and no scope was left for the enactment of the second proviso to section 10 in the Land Reforms Act. The enactment of the proviso was, therefore, without jurisdiction.

This leaves for consideration the second sub-rule added to rule 20 in December, 1964, by the State Government. It will be noticed that the rule as it stood previously applied prospectively to all leases which came to be executed after the promulgation of the rules. The second sub-rule made applicable those provisions to all leases subsisting on the date of the promulgation of the rules. The short question is whether the rules could operate on leases in existence prior to their enactment without the authority of a competent Legislature. Vested rights cannot be taken away except under authority of law and mere rule-making power without the support of a legislative enactment is not capable of achieving such an end. There being two Legislatures to consider, namely, Parliament and the State Legislature we have first to decide which Legislature would be competent to grant such power.

We have already held that the whole of the legislative field was covered by the Parliamentary declaration read with the provisions of Act (LXVII of 1957), particularly section 15. We have also held that Entry 23 of List II was to that extent cut down by Entry 54 of List I. The whole of the topic of minor minerals became a Union subject. The Union Parliament allowed rules to be made but that did not recreate a scope for legislation at the State level. Therefore, if the old leases were to be modified a legislative enactment by Parliament on the lines of section 16 of Act (LXVII of 1957) was necessary. The place of such a law could not be taken by legislation by the State Legislature as it purported to do by enacting the second Proviso to section 10 of the Land Reforms Act. It will further be seen that Parliament in section 4 of Act (LXVII of 1957) created an express bar although section 4 was not applicable to minor minerals. Whether section 4 was intended to apply to minor minerals as well or any part of it applies to minor minerals are questions we cannot consider in view of the clear declaration in section 14 of Act (LXVII of 1957) that the provisions of sections 4-13 (inclusive) do not apply. Therefore, there does not exist any prohibition such as is to be found in section 4 (1) proviso in respect of minor minerals. Although section 16 applies to minor minerals it only permits modification of mining leases granted before 25th October, 1949. In regard to leases of minor minerals executed between this date and December, 1964, when Rule 20 (1) was enacted, there is no provision of law which enables the terms of existing leases to be altered. A mere rule is not sufficient.

Faced with this difficulty Mr. Lal Narain Sinha attempted to claim power for the second proviso to section 10 of the Land Reforms Act from entry 18 of List II, a contention we have rejected. He also attempted to find a field for enactment by the State Legislature for the said proviso. This argument was extremely ingenious and needs separate notice.

The contention was that modification of existing leases was a separate topic altogether and was not covered by section 15 of Act (LXVII of 1957). Therefore if Parliament had not said anything on the subject the field was open to the State Legislature. The other side pointed to the words "and for purposes connected therewith" in section 15 and contended that those words were sufficiently wide to take in modification of leases". Mr. Lal Narain Sinha's argument is unfortunately not tenable in view of the two rulings of this Court. On the basis of those rulings we have held that the entire legislative field in relation to minor minerals had been withdrawn from the State Legislature. We have also held that vested rights could only be taken away by law made by a competent Legislature. Mere rule-making power of the State Government was not able to reach them. The authority to do so must, therefore, have emanated from Parliament. The existing provision related to regulation of leases and matters connected therewith to be granted in future and not for alteration of the terms of leases which were in existence before Act (LXVII of 1957). For that special legislative provision was necessary. As no such Parliamentary Law had been passed the second sub-rule to Rule 20 was ineffective. It could not derive substance from the second proviso to section 10 (2) of the Land Reforms Act since that proviso was not validly enacted.

In the result, therefore, these appeals must succeed. They are allowed with costs. A mandamus shall issue restraining the State Government from enforcing the provisions of the second proviso to section 10 (2) added by Bihar Land Reforms (Amendment) Act, 1964 (Bihar Act IV of 1965) and the second sub-rule of Rule 20 added by a notification on 10th December, 1964 to the Bihar Mineral Concession Rules 1964.

Railway Stores (Unlawful Possession) Act (LI of 1955), section 3—Ingredients of offence—Burden of proof—Section 2—"Railway Stores"—Meaning of.

Before any one can be charged with the offence under section 3 of the Railways Stores (Unlawful Possession), Act, 1955, it must be shown that he was in possession of railway stores which, under the definition in section 2, does not include all articles which are the property of a railway administration but only those which are used or intended to be used in the construction, operation or maintenance of a railway.

Mere unlawful possession of the property of any railway is not an offence. The prosecution must also prove that the article was being actually used or was intended to be used by the railway. Any article which is the property of a railway administration but which has been discarded or rejected for further use would be outside the definition of railway stores.

It is only when the articles satisfy the definition of "railway stores" that the prosecution can be successfully launched against a person in unlawful possession thereof. Even in such a case the prosecution must first adduce evidence to show that there was cause for reasonable suspicion of the stores being stolen or obtained unlawfully. It is only when the burden in respect of this is discharged by the prosecution that the onus shifts to the accused to account satisfactorily for his possession of the same. He may, for instance, show that he had purchased the property in open market where goods of this kind are usually sold, or he had bought them from someone bona fide in the belief that the vendor had lawfully obtained the same.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and Order dated the 6th October, 1967 of the Allahabad High Court, Lucknow Bench in Criminal Revision No. 152 of 1966.

H. R. Khanna and O. P. Rana, Advocates, for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Mitter, J.—In this appeal by Special Leave the appellant challenges his conviction under section 3 of the Railway Stores (Unlawful Possession) Act, 1955.

The Act is a measure providing for punishment of persons in unlawful possession of railway stores who cannot satisfactorily account how they came by the same. By section 2 "railway stores" are defined to mean any article—(a) which is the property of any railway administration; and (b) which is used or intended to be used in the construction, operation or maintenance of a railway. Section 3 defines the offence as also the measure of punishment therefor. It reads:

"If any person is found, or is proved to have been, in possession of any article of railway stores reasonably suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained, and cannot account satisfactorily how he came by the same, he shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both."

Before any one can be charged with the offence under section 3 it must be shown that he was in possession of railway stores which by the definition of section does not include all articles which are the property of a railway administration but only those which are used or intended to be used in the construction, operation or maintenance of a railway. Mere unlawful possession of the property of any railway administration is not an offence. The prosecution must also prove that the articles were being actually used or were intended to be used for by the railway. Thus any article which is the property of a railway administration but which has been discarded or rejected for further use would be outside the definition of railway stores. Railway stores may be new or old and an offence may be committed in respect of stores of either kind. If the railway administration has no further use of them be they new or old as in the case where they have become unserviceable or out-moded no person can be charged with an offence under section 3 in respect thereof. It is only when the articles satisfy the definition of railway stores that the prosecution can be successfully launched against a person in unlawful possession thereof. Even in such a case, the prosecution must first adduce evidence to show that there was cause for reasonable suspicion of the stores being stolen or obtained unlawfully. It is only when the burden in respect of this is discharged by the prosecution that the onus shifts to the accused to account satisfactorily of his possession of the same. He may, for instance, show that he had purchased the property in open market where goods of this kind are usually sold or that he had bought them from someone bona fide in the belief that the vendor had lawfully obtained the same.

The facts in this case are as follows. On the strength of some information received on 28th July, 1964, that some stolen railway property was being sent out of Lucknow through a motor transport agency, a Sub-Inspector attached to the Railway Protection Force along with another Sub-Inspector of Police searched the premises of the motor transport company at Lucknow the same night the search which took place in the presence of the appellant and the manager of the transport company revealed that a large number of parts of railway machinery (railway engines) bearing railway marks were contained in 23 bags of metal scrap booked the same day by the appellant for consignment to Jullunder. The usual formality of preparing a recovery memo. and the sealing of goods in bags in the presence of witnesses was gone through. One Jaswant Singh, described as an expert of railway machinery parts and Foreman and Chief Inspector of N. R. Kotwali Chowk Lucknow, examined the goods said to be railway stores and kept in 11 bags and made a report to the effect that they were all railway stores being parts of a railway engine. It was the case for the prosecution that the appellant failed to offer any satisfactory explanation of his possession of the goods. On the strength of the evidence adduced and principally on the report of Jaswant Singh along with his oral testimony the Magistrate found him guilty and sentenced him to imprisonment for two years. The conviction was maintained by the Sessions Judge and the High Court.

The report made by Jaswant Singh shows that he had examined the material which he classified under 38 heads and described the same as unauctionable property. Against each item he put a remark either "O" or "H", "O" signifying old goods and 'N' meaning new ones. The report seems to suggest that the goods being unauctionable a third party could not lawfully obtain possession of the same. Curiously in his testimony before the Court although he said that he had prepared the report and signed the same he made no statement to the effect that the contents of the report were correct. His definite averment was:

"Railway engine is auctioned in the market. I cannot say if these articles were auctioned in the market. I cannot say if these articles were auctioned or not."

In his cross-examination he repeated the same averment in different words but only added that he had examined the articles and they were parts of an engine and that railway articles were mixed with other goods in the bags. From his deposition it is not possible to spell out any averment to the effect that the items mentioned in his report were used or intended to be used in the construction, operation or maintenance of a railway.

In our view there was no evidence before the Courts to prove that the articles seized were railway stores within the meaning of section 2 of the Act. Our attention was drawn to the case of *Moyalal Rostagir v. The State*¹, wherein it was held that in order to prove that the articles were railway stores it was necessary to establish that the articles in question were not only the property belonging to a railway administration but they were used or intended to be used for the construction, or operation of a railway. Counsel for the respondent however cited a decision of the Orissa High Court in *Uday Dalai v. The State*². The materials seized in that case were tie-bars and iron sleepers which were brand new. According to the learned Judge of the Orissa High Court:

"* * * section 2 of the Act does not require the prosecution to prove that the incriminating articles belonged to a particular railway. From the evidence of P.W. 5 it can be reasonably inferred that as the seized articles were found to conform to the specifications of the Indian Railway Standards they held that they belonged to any of the railways in India. His further evidence that they were 'brand new' is also sufficient to show that they were intended to be used in the construction, operation or maintenance of the railway."

In our view although the prosecution is not called upon to prove that the goods belonged to any particular railway administration it has to establish that the articles were the property of a railway administration. Evidence to the effect that the goods conformed to the Railway Standards falls short of such proof. In most cases the burden of proof in this respect may be discharged by leading evidence about the identifying marks on the goods or some peculiarity of the goods not to be found in cases of non-railway goods. Again the mere description of the goods as new would not fulfil the requirements of section 2 (b). Some evidence will have to be led to the effect that the goods of the kind were being actually used by a railway administration and that the goods were in a serviceable condition. In the case of goods which had not been put to use evidence would have to be led to establish that they had been manufactured for such use.

1. (1962) 66 C.W.N. 269.

2. (1964) 30 Cut. L.T. 275.

The evidence in the case before us did not establish that the goods were railway stores within the meaning of section 2 of the Act and as such the question of punishment under section 3 did not arise. The appeal will therefore be allowed and the bail bond of the appellant directed to be cancelled.

Displaced persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act (XLIV of 1954), section 24 (2)—Scope and applicability—Cancellation of allotment—Conditions precedent—Absence of finding that allotment was obtained by fraud, false representation or concealment of material facts—Effect.

Before the Chief Settlement Commissioner can pass an order under section 24 (2) of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act, cancelling an allotment granted to a displaced person, there must be a clear finding that the allottee had obtained the allotment of land "by means of fraud, false representation or concealment of any material fact" within the meaning of that sub-section. A mere finding recorded by him that the allottee had not proved his title to any land in Pakistan and that the allotment was "undeserved" is not tantamount to a finding that the allotment had been obtained by fraud, false representation or concealment of any material fact. Such a finding is a condition precedent for taking action under section 24 (2). The condition imposed in mandatory and in the absence of any such finding, the Chief Settlement Commissioner has no jurisdiction to cancel the allotment made.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order dated the 26th October, 1965 of the Punjab High Court in Letters Patent Appeal No. 174 of 1964.

Bishan Narain, Senior Advocate, (S. K. Mehta and K. L. Mehta, Advocates of M/s. K. L. Mehta & Co. with him), for Appellant.

Harbans Singh and R. N. Sachthy, Advocates for Respondents.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ramaswami, J.—In the month of August, 1942, the appellant-company (hereinafter called the Company) was incorporated with its registered office in the city of Jullunder dealing in sale and purchase of land as its substantial business. By a sale deed executed on 24th November, 1944, the company purchased 646 kanals, 9 marlas of land from Harjit Singh for a sum of Rs. 32,326. The land was located in village Monanpura of District Sheikpura, now in West Pakistan. Out of the consideration for the sale, a sum of Rs. 9,000 was left with the company for payment to the previous mortgagees and the balance of the money was paid to Harjit Singh before the Sub-Registrar at the time of registration. On the basis of the registered sale deed the company was allotted 27 standard acres and $11\frac{1}{2}$ units of land in village Bohani, Tehsil Phagwara, District Kapurthala in the year 1950 in lieu of the land abandoned in Pakistan. A sanad No. K2/4/8 dated 9th March, 1950 was issued in favour of the company. There was consolidation of holdings in village Bohani and as a result of consolidation the area allotted to the company came to 23 kanals and 5 marlas. Out of this the company sold $9\frac{1}{2}$ kanals to Mohan Singh, a Jat of village Bohani for Rs. 1,900.00 by registered sale deed, dated 22nd May, 1956. Another portion of 220 kanals and 15 marlas was sold on 12th September, 1958 for Rs. 10,012 to one Mehnga Singh and his sons. It was later discovered that the company had been allotted less area of land than it was entitled to as a result of consolidation operations and so an additional area of 24 kanals was allotted to the company in village Bohani to make up the deficiency. On 30th August, 1960 the Managing Officer, respondent No. 3, made a report, Annexure C, to the Chief Settlement Commissioner, Respondent No. 2 recommending cancellation of the allotment of land to the company and consequently the grant of permanent rights to it. The company was heard by the Chief Settlement Commissioner and thereafter the Chief Settlement Commissioner rejected the registered sale deed and balance-sheets and relying on the jamabandi, annexure X, came to the conclusion that at the time of partition the company did not own any land in Pakistan nor was it in occupation of any such land. By his order dated 27th February, 1961 respondent No. 2 set aside the permanent rights acquired by the company to the extent of 27 standard acres, $11\frac{1}{2}$ units and also cancelled the quasi-permanent allotment of the land made in the name of the company. On 29th March, 1961, a revision petition was filed by the company to the Central Government, respondent No. 1. But the revision petition was dismissed on 10th May, 1961. On 8th June 1961, the company filed a writ petition under Article 226 of the Constitution praying for grant of a writ to quash the order of the Chief Settlement Commissioner, dated 27th February, 1961. The writ petition was allowed by Shamshar Bahadur, J. But the respondent took the matter in appeal under clause 10 of Letters Patent to a Division Bench which reversed the judgment of the learned single Judge and ordered the writ petition to be dismissed.

Section 24 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act, (LXIV of 1954) (hereinafter called the Act) states:

“(1) The Chief Settlement Commissioner may at any time call for the record of any proceeding under this Act in which a Settlement Officer, an Assistant Settlement Officer, an Assistant Settlement Commissioner, an Additional Settlement Commissioner, a Settlement Commissioner, a Managing Officer or a Managing Corporation has passed an order for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the legality or propriety of any such order and may pass such order in relation thereto as he thinks fit.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power under subsection (1), if the Chief Settlement Commissioner is satisfied that any order for payment of compensation to a displaced person or any lease or allotment granted to such a person has been obtained by him by means of fraud, false representation or concealment of any material fact, then, notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, the Chief Settlement Commissioner may pass an order directing that no compensation shall be paid to such a person or reducing the amount of compensation to be paid to him, or as the case may be, cancelling the lease or allotment granted to him; and if it is found that a displaced person has been paid compensation which is not payable to him, or which is in excess of the amount payable to him, such amount or excess, as the case may be, may on a certificate issued by the Chief Settlement Commissioner, be recovered in the same manner as an arrear of land revenue.

In support of the appeal it was contended on behalf of the company that the document described as jamabandi, annexure H to writ petition, was not the jamabandi of the year 1946-47 of the land in dispute and the Division Bench was in error in holding that the Chief Settlement Commissioner could properly rely upon annexure H. It was pointed out that annexure H was not the jamabandi for 1946-47 but it consisted of three notes one saying "Maamur bai," that is, that there is no land of non-Muslims in the village, the second note related to Kartar Chand and Gopal Dass who embraced Islam and the third related to sale of his land by Harjit Singh in favour of S. A. Latif. All these notes are dated 3rd May, 1951. It was pointed out that these notes were made on 3rd May, 1961 for the purposes of exchange of jamabandi and the document did not depict the state of affairs as on 15th August, 1947 which was the material date. It is not necessary to examine this document in detail for we are of opinion that the appeal must be allowed and the order of the Chief Settlement Commissioner must be quashed on the ground that there is no finding of the Chief Settlement Commissioner that the company had obtained allotment of the land "by means of fraud, false representation or concealment of any material fact" within the meaning of section 24 (2) of the Act. It is true that the Chief Settlement Commissioner had recorded a finding that the company had not proved its title to any land in village Momonpura and the allotment was "undeserved." But this is not tantamount to a finding that the allotment had been obtained by a false representation or fraud or concealment of material facts. Such a finding is a condition precedent for taking action under section 24 (2) of the Act. The condition imposed by the section is mandatory and in the absence of any such finding the Chief Settlement Commissioner had no jurisdiction to cancel the allotment made to the company under section 24 (2) of the Act. For these reasons we hold that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the Division Bench dated 26th October, 1965 in Letters Patent Appeal should be reversed and the judgment of Shamshar Bahadur, J., dated 28th November, 1963 quashing the order of the Chief Settlement Commissioner dated 27th February, 1961, should be restored.

The appeal is accordingly allowed with costs.

Suppression of Immoral Traffic in Women and Girls Act (CIV of 1956), section 15 (1)
—Scope—Search of the premises—Omission to record the reasons before search or even thereafter in a proper way if makes the trial illegal.

Suppression of Immoral Traffic in Women and Girls Act (CIV of 1956), section 15 (2)
—Scope—Search of the premises—Non-compliance with the directions, if amounts to an illegality—Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), section 537—Applicability.

On the question whether the trial became illegal by reason of the search not having been conducted strictly in accordance with the provisions of section 15 of the Suppression of Immoral Traffic in Women and Girls Act, (CIV of 1956).

Held that, (1) The omission to record the reasons before the search as required under section 15 (1) of the Act or even thereafter in a proper way does not make the trial illegal because jurisdiction or power to make a search was conferred by the statute and not derived from the recording of reasons.

(2) Non-compliance with the directions contained in section 15 (2) of the Act in the matter of search would only be an irregularity and not such an illegality which will vitiate the trial. It is significant that there is no provision in the Act according to which any search carried out in contravention of section 15 would render the trial illegal. It is therefore abundantly clear that section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code would be applicable to the proceedings in the present case.

Appeal by Special Leave from the Judgment and Order, dated the 12th/13th October, 1966 of the Gujarat High Court in Criminal Appeal No. 390 of 1965.

B. Datta, Advocate for J. B. Dadachanji & Co. for Appellant.

H. R. Khanna and B. D. Sharma Advocates, for Respondent.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Grover J.—The sole point which arises for decision in this appeal by Special Leave is whether the trial became illegal by reason of the search not having been conducted strictly in accordance with the provisions of section 15 of the Suppression of Immoral Traffic in Women and Girls Act (CIV of 1956), hereinafter called the "Act."

The facts need not be stated in detail. The appellant and two other persons were tried for various offences under the provisions of the Act, the charge substantially against her being that she was keeping a brothel in her house and knowingly lived on the earnings of the prostitution of women and girls. All the three accused persons were acquitted by the magistrate. The State preferred an appeal to the High Court against the appellant and the third accused only. The High Court set aside the order of acquittal in respect of the appellant and convicted her for offences punishable under sections 3 (1) and 4 (1) of the Act. She was sentenced to suffer rigorous imprisonment for one year and to pay a fine of Rs. 200 (in default to suffer further rigorous imprisonment for six months) and to suffer rigorous imprisonment for six months) on the second count the sentences of imprisonment being concurrent.

The prosecution case was that on receiving complaints from several residents of the locality a raiding party was organised. The services of a decoy witness Kishan Taumal were requisitioned and he agreed to work as the punter. After ascertaining that he had no money he was given Rs. 8 in all. That amount included a currency note of Rs. 5 and three currency notes of Re. 1 each, the numbers of notes having been noted down in the first part of the panchanama. The punter was instructed to hand over the amount for the charges that would have to be paid for having sexual intercourse with any girl or woman in the appellant's house. He was however only to engage himself in talk and not the actual act. A punch witness Prem Singh Hiraji was also to accompany the raiding party. The raid was ultimately made according to the original plan and Kishan, the punter managed to engage a woman in conversation in a room in the house of the appellant. The raiding party found that she had opened the buttons of her blouse and she was found with her clothes in such a disordered condition that it was apparent that she was getting ready to have sexual intercourse with Kishan, but on seeing the police party she got up and dressed herself. The seven currency notes, i.e. one five rupee note and two of one rupee currency notes were recovered from the appellant which were marked and which had been given by Kishan. Sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 15 of the Act provide as follows:

"(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force whenever the special police officer has reasonable grounds for believing that an offence punishable under this Act has been or is being committed in respect of a woman or girl living in any premises and that such search of the premises with warrant cannot be made without undue delay such officer may, after recording the grounds of his belief enter and search such premises without a warrant.

(2) Before making a search under sub-section (1) the Special Police Officer shall call upon two or more respectable inhabitants (at least one of whom shall be a woman) of the locality in which the place to be searched is situate, to attend and witness the search, and may issue an order in writing to them or any of them so to do."

What has been stressed greatly by learned Counsel for the appellant is that the Act being a special Act its provisions should have been strictly followed. It is pointed out that the panch witness Prem Singh was not an inhabitant of the locality in which the place to be searched was situate. Another panch witness had also been taken who was a woman (Bai Shanta) to satisfy the requirement of sub-section (2) of section 15 but she also was not an inhabitant of the locality where the house of the appellant was situate. It has been pointed out that in *Public Prosecutor, Andhra Pradesh v. Uttavalli Nageswararao*¹ it was held by Sharfuddin Ahmed J., that the Act being a special piece of legislation enacted with a specific purpose all the directions contained in section 15 were mandatory. According to the learned Judge while the recording of reasons for proceeding without obtaining the search warrant might not be done which was a matter of discretion, so far as the requisition of the services of the respectable inhabitants was concerned the direction was mandatory and the Legislature by insisting on the presence of one woman mediator at the time of search had undoubtedly chosen to safeguard the interests of the persons with whom the Act was intended to deal. In that case the services of a woman mediator had not been requisitioned at all. The search was held to be altogether illegal with the result that the accused person in that case was acquitted and his acquittal was upheld by the High Court.

In the present case two main defects have been pointed out in the matter of search; one is that the Special Police Officer Shri Markad has been found both by the Magistrate and the High Court to have prepared the document Exhibit 81-A long after the search. As found by the High Court this document contained reproduction of section 15 (1) and it hardly contained any ground on which the Police Officer had formed the belief with regard to the matters stated in sub-section (1). The other point which has been pressed on behalf of the appellant relates to contravention of sub-section (2) inasmuch as the panch witnesses were not inhabitants of the locality in which the appellant's house was situate. The High Court was of the view that power to conduct the search was derived from the statute and not from the recording of reasons and therefore the search was not rendered illegal in the present case, on account of contravention of section 15 (1) of the Act. On the second point it was held that there was no provision in law which rendered the evidence of the panch witnesses inadmissible even though section 15 (2) had been contravened. The High Court did not agree with the decision of the Andhra Pradesh High Court that the directions contained in sub-section (2) were of a mandatory nature.

Our attention has been drawn to *State of Rajasthan v. Rehman*² in which a Deputy Superintendent of Central Excise who had received information that the respondent in that case had cultivated tobacco but had not paid the excise duty went to search his house. He was obstructed while making the search with the result that he fell down and was injured. The respondent was prosecuted under section 353, Indian Penal Code. It was held that section 165 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was applicable to such a search and the search being in contravention of that section it was illegal. The respondent therefore had been rightly acquitted. In this case however it was observed that the recording of reasons under section 165 did not confer on the officer jurisdiction to make search though it is a necessary condition for doing so. Jurisdiction or power to make a search was conferred by the statute and not derived from the recording of reasons. These observations are sufficient to dispose of the first point which has been pressed about the omission to record the reasons before the search of even thereafter in a proper way. This case cannot be of much assistance to the appellant because no question is involved in the present case of any public servant having been obstructed in the course of a search conducted under section 165 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The trial of the appellant was for contravention of certain provisions of the Act and the search was made in respect of those offences. The trial having taken place the question of the applicability of section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code will at once arise. If the non-observance of the provisions of section 15 (2) is not an illegality but is a mere irregularity then the sentence cannot be set aside unless it can be shown that such irregularity has caused failure of justice. As will be presently seen we are of the opinion that non-compliance with the directions contained in section 15 (2) in the matter of search would only be an irregularity and not such an illegality which will vitiate the trial. The decision in *Delhi Administration v. Ram Singh*¹, which concerned offences committed under the Act and on which reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellant involved a different point. There the Police Officer who had entered the premises where the offences were alleged to be committed was not a Special Police Officer who alone is authorised to do the various things mentioned in the provisions of the Act. It was observed that the Act created new offences and provided for the forum before which they would be tried. Necessary provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure had been adopted fully or with modification. As the Act provided machinery to deal with the offences created, the necessary implication must be that the new machinery was to deal with those offences in accordance with the provisions of the special Act. The entire police work connection with the purposes of the Act within a certain area had been put in the charge of a Special Police Officer. According to the majority judgment in that case, only the Special Police Officer was competent to investigate and as the investigation had been conducted by a regular Police Officer who did not come within the category of a Special Police Officer the order of the magistrate quashing the charge-sheet was upheld. This case certainly supports one part of the submission of the counsel for the appellant that the Act is a complete Code with respect to what has to be done under it. In that sense it would be legitimate to say that a search which is to be conducted under the Act must comply with the provisions contained in section 15; but it cannot be held that if a search is not carried out strictly in accordance with the provisions of that section the trial is rendered illegal. There is hardly any parallel between an officer conducting a search who has no authority under the law and a search having been made which does not strictly conform to the provisions of section 15 of the Act. The principles which have been settled with regard to the effect of an irregular search made in exercise of the powers under section 165 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would be fully applicable even to a case under the Act where the search has not been made in strict compliance with its provisions. It is significant that there is no provisions in the Act according to which any search carried out in contravention of section 15 would render the trial illegal. In the absence of such a provision we must apply the law which has been laid down with regard to searches made under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Now in *The State of Uttar Pradesh v. Bhagwati Kishore Jishi*², this court had to deal with a case where a booking clerk was stated to have committed an offence of criminal breach of trust. A Sub-Inspector of police made some investigation and submitted a report but this was done without obtaining the order of a magistrate. Subsequently the permission of the magistrate was obtained to investigate into the case as required by section 5-A of the Prevention of Corruption Act. After making further investigation he submitted a charge sheet. The respondent in that case was tried and convicted under section 5 (2) of that Act. It was held by this Court (by the majority) that there was a contravention of section 5-A of the Prevention of Corruption Act at the first stage of investigation when the requisite permission of the magistrate had not been obtained but after the permission had been given there was practically a de novo investigation. Therefore, the accused not having been prejudiced by the illegality committed by the police, the conviction could not be set aside on the ground of mere irregularity or illegality in the matter of investigation. The following passage at page 84 may be usefully reproduced:

2. (1964) 3 S.C.R. 71.

“The High Court set aside the conviction on the ground that there was a breach of the mandatory safeguards of the Act in that the first stage of the investigation was contrary to the provisions of the Act. But it did not consider the other question whether the said breach caused prejudice to the accused in the matter of his trial. In doing so, the High Court ignored the provisions of section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Having carefully gone through the record for the reasons aforesaid, we are satisfied that no such prejudice has been caused to the accused. He had a fair trial and had his full say.”

It is abundantly clear that section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code would be applicable to the proceedings in the present case. Section 5 (2) of the Code provides that all offences under the Indian Penal Code shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with according to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. All offences under any other law shall be similarly investigated etc., according to the same provisions but subject to any enactment regulating the manner or place of investigating, inquiring into, trying or otherwise dealing with such offences. According to section 22 no Court inferior to that of a magistrate as defined in clause (c) of section 2 shall try any offence under sections 3 to 8 of the Act.

Thus all proceedings including investigation had to be conducted in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code except to the extent of the specific provisions contained in the Act. No such provision has been brought to our notice nor indeed has it been contended that section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would not govern the investigation, inquiry or trial of the offences with which the appellant was charged. The ratio of the decision in the case of *Bhagwati Kishore Joshi*¹ must be followed and in the absence of any prejudice having been shown by non-compliance with the provisions of sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 15 of the Act, the order of the High Court must be upheld.

In conclusion it may be observed that the investigating agencies cannot and ought not to show complete disregard of such provisions as are contained in sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 15 of the Act. The Legislature in its wisdom provided special safeguards owing to the nature of the premises which have to be searched involving inroads on the privacy of citizens and handling of delicate situations in respect of females. But the entire proceedings and the trial do not become illegal and vitiated owing to the non-observance of or non-compliance with the directions contained in the aforesaid provisions. The Court, however, has to be very careful and circumspect in weighing the evidence where there has been such a failure on the part of the investigating agency but unless and until some prejudice is shown to have been caused to the accused person or persons the conviction and the sentence cannot be set aside. It may not be out of place to reiterate what was said in *H. N. Rishbud and Inder Singh v. The State of Delhi*², that a defect or an illegality in the investigation, however serious, has no direct bearing on the competency or the procedure relating to cognizance or trial of an offence and that whenever such a situation arises, section 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is attracted and unless the irregularity or the illegality in the investigation or trial can be shown to have brought about a miscarriage of justice, the result is not affected.

For the above reasons this appeal fails and it is dismissed.

Appeal from the Judgment and Order, dated the 6th February, 1964, of the Madras High Court in O.S.A.No. 39 of 1961.

T.R. Sangameswaran and K. Jayaram, Advocates, for Appellant.

A.K. Sen, Senior Advocate, (M.S. Narasimhan and S. Balakrishnan, Advocates, with him), for Respondents Nos. 1, 5, 6 and 7.

The Judgment of the Court was delivered by

Ray, J.—This appeal is from the judgment of the High Court at Madras, dated 6th February, 1964, dismissing the appellant's suit.

The important question which falls for consideration is whether the deed of trust dated 1st January, 1908 created an absolute dedication to charity subject only to a charge for the payment of maintenance to the members of the founder's family or whether the dominant intention of the founder was the maintenance of the family and the grant to the charities was secondary.

The trust deed was executed on 1st January, 1908, by S.D. Mudaliar in favour of himself, A. P. M. Mudaliar, M.T.S. Mudaliar and C.V.S. Mudaliar. S.D. Mudaliar and his pre-deceased son D.S. Mudaliar's adopted son S. Mudaliar effected a deed of partition dated 25th November, 1907 in respect of the immovable and movable properties. By the said deed of partition S.D. Mudaliar the settlor of the deed of trust obtained the property forming the subject matter of the said trust deed. The founder dedicated the said property by the deed of trust to the trustees. The trustees were the settlor and three other Mudaliars, viz., A.P.M. Mudaliar, M.T.S. Mudaliar and C.V.S. Mudaliar.

Broadly stated, the trust deed contained the following provisions. First, the trustees after excluding the tax and maramath expenses, shall during the lifetime of the settlor pay him entire income for the purpose of discharging the debt of Rs. 3,000 mentioned in the deed of partition and for the maintenance of the settlor during his lifetime. Secondly, after the death of the settlor the balance of the debt that might be found due on the date after excluding the payments made by the settlor is to be paid to the creditors. Thirdly, after the settlor's lifetime a sum of Rs. 10 per mensem would be paid out of the income to the settlor's daughter-in-law, namely, the appellant's grand-mother, viz., father's mother "for her lifetime, for her charity expenses". Fourthly, after the lifetime of the appellant's grand-mother the trustees are to pay a sum of Rs. 10 per mensem permanently to the appellant's adoptive father who was the adopted son of the appellant's grand-mother and of the settlor's pre-deceased son and after the lifetime of the appellant's adoptive father "to his male descendants hereditarily". Fifthly, the settlor gave full power to the trustees after meeting the expenses of the Utsavam to be celebrated in Nungambakkam Devasthanams and the trust expenses and the tax and maramath expenses to expend such sum as they might deem proper to maintain and educate the male descendants of the settlor's pre-deceased adopted son. The settlor further provided that if the trustees were not willing they would stop such maintenance and education expenses. Sixthly, the trustees after the life-time of the settlor would spend from and out of the aforesaid trust income in such manner as they might deem proper and have the Vasantha Utsavam celebrated for a period of not less than three days during the Vasantha Utsavam which would be celebrated every year in the Temples of Sri Agastheeswarar and Venkatesa Perumal installed by the settlor's ancestors and enshrined in Nungambakkam. Finally, after the lifetime of the settlor the trustees were directed to accumulate the amount remaining out of the income from the property after excluding the assessment, quit-rent and maramath and the monthly and annual expenses and purchase properties therewith and provide the same as income for the aforesaid charity.

In the background of these provisions, counsel for the appellant contended that the dominant intention was a provision by way of a settlement for the members of the family and that the charities were subsidiary purposes to the said deed of trust. The provisions or direction to the trustees first to accumulate the income after meeting the expenses of assessment, quit rent and maramath and the monthly and annual expenses and secondly to purchase properties therewith were to provide income only for the aforesaid charity. The words "for the aforesaid charity" are of important significance. The entire accumulation was for the charity. The provisions regarding maintenance and education were subordinate to the provisions for meeting the expenses of the Utsavam. The matter does not rest there. The provisions regarding maintenance and education were to be at the sole discretion of the trustees who could stop the same if the trustees were not willing. This power of trustees to stop maintenance and education expenses is a complete negation of the appellant's contention that the intention of the settlor was that education and maintenance expenses were the dominant purpose of the settlement. The reason is obvious. The dominant object is never allowed by the settlor to be repelled by a discretion conferred on the trustees to stop such expenses. This power to stop is consistent with the intention of the settlor to treat the education and maintenance expenses as secondly objects only after the primary purpose of the trust, namely, charities are fulfilled. The tenor of the document points to the inescapable conclusion that the pre-dominant and overwhelming intention of the settlor was to benefit the charities and provide for the same not only by making the expenses for the charities as the first and foremost direction but also by providing for accumulation of income and purchase of properties out of the said accumulated income only for the purpose of charities.

A contention was raised by the appellant that the High Court should not have reversed the finding of the trial Court for the payment of maintenance of the appellant at Rs. 50 per mensem. The High Court came to the conclusion that there was no legal principle to sustain this increase in maintenance. In this Court the contention which was raised in the High Court was repeated, viz., that this was a case where the cy-pres doctrine would apply. The cy-pres doctrine applies where a charitable trust is initially impossible or impracticable and the Court applies the property cy-pres, viz., to some other charities as nearly as possible, resembling the original trust. In the present case, the maintenance and education expenses are neither charitable trusts nor similar objects of charity.

For these reasons, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. The appellant will pay the court-fees.
